3. Her baby had better care during its last illness than its mother was ever able to bestow upon it. The trained nurse who cared for Mrs. Catherine Booth during her last illness has ever since taken charge of Mrs. Booth-Tucker's children. This consecrated woman is better qualified by her health, strength and experience to do full justice to these delicate little ones than is their mother, but any one personally acquainted with Mrs. Booth-Tucker knows that her unusually strong and tender love for children does not allow her to throw her own entirely upon another woman's care, even to preach the gospel. She is a most devoted mother, and her children (including an adopted one) receive from her a constant and tender oversight for body and soul. Although an American, I have known Mrs. Booth-Tucker for eleven years, and can vouch for her character as a Christian and a mother, as well as for the facts I give you. Sincerely yours in the service of Jesus,

The Massachusetts Churches in Annual Session.

Fall River, May 19-21.

The busy city of Fall River contained the loadstone of the Bay State churches this year, and the fathers and sons of the Pilgrim faith gathered beside "the falling waters" for three days last week to accept the good will of their brethren of the "border city" and to leave an impress on the 90,000 people whose industry has made theirs the largest cotton manufacturing center in America. A gracious shower, prophetic of the large blessing which fell upon the gathering, called forth the freshness in verdure and in the atmosphere for the arriving delegates to this ninety-fourth session in the Central Church edifice.

At the word of Sec. H. A. Hazen the ship of State got under way, with Dr. Smith Baker at the helm, and the pastor, Rev. W. W. Jubb, acting as host for his people, enlarged the welcome and greetings which had already been felt. He directed the thought of the visitors back over the local changes of three decades since the body previously met with Central Church, dwelling chiefly on the need of a deeper esprit de corps in his own city and in the denomination. He then opened the way for an additional welcome by the Fall River Ministerial Association, whose eleven members present represented about seven denominations and were captained by Rev. W. J. Martin. He praised in high terms the beginnings and growth of our faith and church and called attention to the munificent public acts of two Fall River Congregationalists in recent gifts to the city of a perfectly appointed high school building and of $100,000 for charities.

THE NEW ORDER.

The changes in the general conduct of the meeting planned by the business committee were experimental in part, but so commended themselves to the universal liking that they will doubtless be indorsed permanently. In the first place, printed committee reports, with a definite allowance of time for explanations, greatly relieved the pressure, and the limiting of papers to twenty minutes each, of opening speakers to ten and of other speakers to five was also a time-saving institution made effective by the tap of the moderator's bell. Each subject was allotted one hour, all too short for the spirited discussion which the new order of management elicited. The open homes of the Fall River Congregationalists also went far toward providing pleasure and comfort to the visitors, and the festive homelikeness of the great family gathering in Music Hall at meal hours was a feature which grew in favor and social value.

THE SERMON HOUR.

Dr. D. S. Clark was the chosen preacher. By a richly descriptive line of thought he led his hearers with the three disciples to a close view of the transfigured Lord, and interpreted the interview with the Master as a message to the present day church, showing how that at this glorified hour Christ's earliest followers caught and held the beginnings of organized righteousness against opposing sin. From that time the church has been deep in meditation, but as yet poorly apprehends its greatest problem of how to lift the Christ on high, who would draw all men unto himself. At the close of the preaching service a statement was made regarding the ministerial fund, and a generous offering of $93 was taken. The communion was celebrated at the close.

Such was the recognized worth of all the papers that it is difficult to do justice briefly to the subjects which follow.

ELABORATED WORSHIP.

In considering The Enrichment of the Church Service the paper by Rev. S. V. Cole and the opening remarks by Dr. Daniel Merriam recognized the tendency of the time toward more elaborate forms of worship, and drew apart noticeably from the Puritan principle of simplicity in worship by advocating the adoption of Pilgrim freedom in its adornment, guided by the Puritan spirit, the end sought to be sympathetic participation, reverence and spirituality on the part of the congregation.

SUPPLYING THE DEMAND.

The alarming report that more than one-half of our non-Catholic population are not church-goers was the text of a most helpful paper by Dr. C. L. Morgan on Providing for the Religious Wants of the Increasing City Population. He explained in clear form a system of co-operative effort in his own locality whereby every person in the district is visited by a common missionary of the several denominations, and is thus brought into relation with his chosen or nearest church "as soon as his inclination permits." Rev. Messrs. J. E. Tuttle, D. D., and W. L. Tenney supplemented these suggestions with especially acceptable remarks.

Rev. A. W. Moore earned an appreciative response from his listeners in his paper on The Preaching Needed by the Churches of Today. He showed the fallacy of being a merely moral teacher, for Christianity has not its root in that alone. The holding up of righteousness and the preaching of truths that will make the highest good reasonable is the line of preaching that will elevate humanity for its own good. Hon. C. G. Reed, on the same subject, offered a business man's advice to the preachers of today. His were practical suggestions as to some details of church services and his most pointed recommendations were: seek for personal contact with your business men during the week and, by proper preparation, earn your money on the Sabbath.

THE YOUTH IN THE CHURCH.

The hour allotted to the Christian Endeavor Society in Its Relation to the Church gave an all-sided view of the possible dangers and benefits of this army of youth. In his opening words Dr. Arthur Little characterized the movement as a growth into the church rather than from it, and one of such present and prospective proportions that anxious inquirers are asking, Will it not rival the church and sow germs of schism? Can it prudently be encouraged in its independence and in its sharp cleavage between young and old? But the speaker and those who followed him, Rev. E. C. Ewing and Rev. C. H. Washburn, unhesitatingly expressed the feeling that Christian Endeavor was headed toward no such "certain error" as was feared by some, and that, since its momentum cannot at any rate be effectually resisted, sympathetic action with it and its utilization and encouragement are the safest attitude toward it on the part of the church. The topic, The Sunday school in its various aspects and the fulfillment of its mission of adding to the church, was presented by Rev. F. B. Makepeace, and following him Rev. Messrs. C. S. Brooks and J. M. Dutton were the first speakers.

OUR WELCOME TO OTHER SECTS.

To just what extent the doors of the Congregational fold should swing open to ministers of other denominations provoked a lively interchange of opinion. An enlightening paper by Rev. J. A. Hamilton, D.D., showed that at least one-eighth of our ministry today is composed of clergymen formerly aliens to our ranks, and it predicted a greater proportion in view of the increasing applications for adoption. While a limit is impossible by edict or force only, the inflow can be effectually stanched by a superior Congregational clergy and a higher standard of admission.

FIDELITY TO OUR CHURCH.

This was the leading thought of a strong session on Denominational Loyalty, and in an easy, informal address Hon. J. A. Lane set the ball in motion, and it was taken up by Hon. Frederick Fosdick and Rev. E. A. Reed The speakers did not assert that ours was the only church more than another, but that all being parts of a composite whole, each should be perfected by the fidelity of its members to its inherent characteristics—our own loyalty being directed toward keeping down artificial barriers and obliterating sectarianism, but making sure that we do as much for ourselves in the future as we have done for other churches in the past.

The need of fellowship in our own church family was made prominent more than once during the session, and was again further enlarged upon at this time as our most serious lack.

STATE MISSIONS.

The association has come to look for an illumined spot in the missionary horizon when Sec. Joshua Coit and Treasurer Palmer offer their annual reports. The meeting of the Home Missionary Society this year furnished no exception, for although the total receipts, $148,973, were about $12,000 less than last year, those figures are considered entirely creditable to the times. Of the $164,041 which has overflowed from Massachusetts into the national treasury, over $99,000 passed through this State society, $38,000 more than last year, and a greater sum by $33,000 than was used this year for its own expenses and missionary work. The rallies held in many places by Secretaries Puddefoot and Shelton and Mrs. Caswell account for the generous response to the General Howard Roll of Honor, so that, of the $90,000 constituting this fund, one-third came from Massachusetts. The amount raised has been sufficient to aid 142 churches and missions through the employment of 138 missionaries, who have reached 7,704 families. The problem of the town and village and of the country pastor has a partial solution in the work of State missions, and now more than ever is that the fact since the ebb tide away from the country is already slackening for the return flow back from the city. Seven hundred new members on confession have been added to the home mission churches, an increase of 10½ per cent. against 4 per cent. received by the other churches of the State. The missionary addresses of the session were made by President Simmons of Fargo College and by Dr. Franklin Carter, president of the society.

GOOD CITIZENSHIP

This topic had a share of attention under the leadership of Rev. W. E. Wolcott. Its obligations were not laid entirely upon the church. Citizens, whether in the church or not, are responsible, affirmed the speaker, and their methods decide the success of their efforts. Open methods, not always assailant but constructive as well, were advocated and also, as indirect influences, education and the assertion of existing laws. Dr. W. H. Allbright and Rev. E. H. Chandler developed further the theme, enforcing particularly the desirability that foreign ministers in this country acquire citizenship; pulpit utterances which will be committal, loyalty to right, whether among the clergy or in politics, and willingness to consider an official position as an opportunity for service.

USE OF RICHES.

One of the best evenings was the last, devoted to addresses on Consecration of Wealth. H. M. Moore, Esq., of Boston spoke from his full experience in consecrated giving when he named giving as an individual question answered to God by every man according to his means. His address abounded in Bible illustrations of the truth that unselfish giving toward God's causes begets more than equal returns. Dr. I. J. Lansing redoubled the emphasis on the relation between giving and getting and set forth the economic aspects of the relations of vice and virtue to wealth, reiterating in his forcible manner the need of extending the Christian faith for the indirect increment of riches. After all, he said, the ownership of wealth is delusive, and only a spirit of frank acknowledgment of God's partnership in the possessions of Christian bodies and individuals can make consecrated wealth multiplied wealth.

FOR A SACRED SABBATH.

Of special reports, that from the committee of last year appointed to express sympathy with Sunday toilers aroused intense interest. The committee recounted special interviews with representatives of 5,000 street car and railroad employés, who frankly acknowledged a fear of asking for one day in seven, although it is their needed and Bible allotted respite. A renewed discussion of Sunday traffic at a subsequent hour developed a nearly evenly marked division over the adoption of certain resolutions commending the subject to the prayerful consideration of the churches. After the liveliest debate of the meeting the resolutions were rejected by a single vote, chiefly because they were suggestive of a seeming inconsistency on the part of some who of necessity patronize Sunday cars.

GENERAL DOINGS.

The sessions would not have been naturally rounded out without the usual filling for chinks and corners. Here were thrown in a hearty indorsement for the fine work of the Board of Pastoral Supply and a recommendation to the churches that they contribute the comparatively small amount desired from each to support the board. Already more than half the churches in the State are paying the assessment; resolutions approving the desire for closer union with the Christian denomination and appointments of delegates to their New England Conference, resolutions on temperance, gambling and the protection of Americans abroad, and in a large space a revision of the general rules.

The statistics of the churches show them to number 589, with 110,179 members, a gain of 705 last year. The additions were 6,750, of whom 3,786 were on confession. The benevolences show an increase of $65,000 and amount to a total of $693,219. The treasurer of the association showed receipts of $6,870 and a balance of $3,772.

As nominees for corporate membership in the American Board the following were chosen: Dr. A. Z. Conrad, Rev. C. E. Jefferson, Dr. E. A. Reed and Deacons C. J. Holmes, J. G. Buttrick and Samuel Usher. The total enrollment of delegates and ministers was 228, of whom sixty-eight were laymen. The superior rendering of musical selections by the soloists and choirs of the First and Central Churches were among other features of the occasion which were specially commended. Rev. A. G. Bale was registrar and Rev. F. J. Marsh assistant registrar of the association. The next meeting will be held with Plymouth Church, Worcester.

THREADS FROM THE COTTON CITY.

That Dr. Quint should have been absent from a Massachusetts State meeting was regretted as much as it was wondered at.

"We are sufficiently liberal in belief to satisfy anybody."

The parsimony of Christianity keeps it poor.—Dr. I. J. Lansing.

The church must not deny what it has set up.—Rev. E. H. Chandler.

To be thoroughly sympathetic with youth makes age impossible.—Dr. Arthur Little.

The preacher is not to mend the social machine, but only to oil it.—Rev. A. W. Moore.

The moderator disliked to use his new bell as much as the speakers disliked to have him.

Next week we hope to print the substance of the report of the secretary of the Board of Pastoral Supply.

About thirty ministers, it was said, now within as many miles of Boston came from the Methodists to us.

The condition of "slavery" in which our railroad servants live is an appalling suggestion in this free North.

The only reflection we cast on our Baptist brethren is that they didn't keep up with Roger Williams.—Hon. J. A. Lane.

It was the repeated sentiment that Congregationalism is in danger of doing more for other denominations than for itself.

Rev. Jeremiah Taylor was the only surviving member of the association who was present at this meeting and at the former gathering in this church.

An expression of sympathy was cabled to the Nonconformists of England in view of the recent reactionary educational measures of the government.

While thinking of Armenia, let us not forget to extend our hand to any man in the commonwealth who is deprived of his Sunday rest.—Rev. F. S. Hatch.

Hear an elderly brother: "I have, perhaps, been too long in the Christian ministry, but I have not been so long a minister but that some of the fire lives in my ashes."

The use of individual cups at the communion service gave many inexperienced brethren an opportunity of witnessing a practical test of the system in a large congregation.

I am a Congregationalist today because I believe in growth in grace and a coming to perfection. I prefer ecclesiastical democracy to ecclesiastical monarchy.—Dr. R. C. Houghton.

The "sanctified Methodists," now a part of us, were on the ground and had the floor frequently during the discussion of the accessions to our ministry from other denominations.

There is food for thought in the sentiment expressed by one brother: "It will be a sad day for Congregationalism when the lay college is allowed to replace the theological seminary."

Souvenir programs and individual maps were tastefully prepared by the business committee with the same provident care of details which accounts largely for the general success of the meetings.

It is rather odd on the part of Congregationalists to refuse to put the symbol of the cross on their churches while the "rooster," the reminder of Peter's denial, is regarded with complacency.—Rev. S. V. Cole.

There was unanimous agreement with the sentiment voiced by Hon. Frederick Fosdick: "Christians left to themselves naturally drift toward Congregationalism. The Christian Endeavor movement was an instance of it."

"When they come and come as a body," said one brother, speaking of extraneous applicants for our fellowship, "we're going to open our arms to all creation. When ministers come let churches come, then we'll all be one Congregational denomination."

How true it is that we do not need to rely on one or two or ten or fifteen of our members to take the platform at the meetings was well illustrated on the last night by the magnificent addresses which almost at the last moment were substituted for those of speakers who were unable to be present.

It seems to me that the best thing we can do to enrich our church service is to provide better ministers—more learned and more consecrated—to weed out and keep out unworthy men. . . . As the Scotchman said when the minister spoke to him about putting a new stove in the kirk, "Warm it with your sermon, man, warm it with your sermon!"—Dr. Daniel Merriman.

COMMENCEMENT AT BANGOR SEMINARY.

The seventy-seventh anniversary opened Monday evening, May 18, with a reception at Professor Beckwith's home. In place of the annual address before the Rhetorical Society, Dr. A. H. Quint being unable to fulfill his engagement, Professor Gilmore gave his inaugural address, Tuesday evening, on The Higher Criticism, Its Methods, Aims and Limitations. Professor Gilmore will fill the chair of English Biblical exegesis and criticism. The trustees elected two new members to the board—J. G. Blake, Esq , and Hon. E. R. Burpee. President Chapman was re-elected, and Hon. G. C. Moses was chosen vice-president. Prof. C. A. Beckwith was granted a year abroad for study. Wednesday forenoon two addresses were given at the alumni meeting, which was open to the public—an interesting change in the usual order. Rev. Daniel Evans read a valuable paper on Changes in Theology Which Make It Imperative that the Church Widen and Deepen Her Work in Human Society. This was followed by an address on the Retarding Influence of a Corrupt Municipal Life on the Work of the Church, by Rev. M. Bean. Racy and earnest discussions by several of the alumni followed on these two burning questions.

The alumni dinner was especially pleasant, being held in the beautiful new gymnasium. There was a large attendance and the postprandial exercises, presided over by President Chapman of the board, opened with appreciative memorial tributes to the late Professor Talcott.

The graduating exercises were held Wednesday evening in the Hammond Street Church. Six speakers represented the class, which is the largest for several years, numbering eighteen. Professor Gilmore spoke helpful words previous to the distribution of diplomas. The delightful weather and good fellowship made the anniversary an occasion long to be remembered.

PASSING COMMENT.

The action of a Minnesota conference last week regarding the Baptist "reordination" of one of our former ministers was prompted in part by the belief that our Baptist brethren did not reflect in their procedure the general opinion of their denomination.

If the statement is correct that the terrible loss at the Cripple Creek fire was made possible by "the haste for gold," which "had prevented the city authorities from providing sufficient water supply," what a tragic commentary on 1 Tim. 6: 10!

The length of the two pastorates of a New Hampshire church would be remarkable if they had occurred at different places. Together they add much more meaning to each other.

A real benefit to our churches would follow the State Associations if pastors and delegates should devote an entire midweek meeting to a review of the sessions.

"There is no debt and no division" is the well-earned record which a New England pastor writes upon the seventh milestone of his pastorate.

It is a satisfaction to know that the time-honored building of a Worcester church will continue as Congregational property.

What boys and girls can do in church work is well suggested in New Jersey news.

THE ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK.

Canandaigua, with its broad streets, shadowed by noble trees of a century's growth, its abundant and refined hospitality and its stanch Congregationalism, gave a royal welcome to the association at its sixty-third meeting, May 19–21. Much of the success of the session was due to the untiring and wise prevision of Rev. C. H. Dickinson, the beloved pastor. The weather was all that could be asked, the business was transacted with genuine good feeling, every part assigned was performed and the addresses were cumulative in power and thought. The familiarity with the association history and precedents gave to the moderator, Dr. W. A. Robinson, unusual fitness for the office, and in the advancing of business he had the aid of the veteran, Rev. James Deane of Crown Point, registrar, and the secretary, Rev. N. W. Bates of West Bloomfield. Rev. W. E. Park, D. D., of Gloversville, sounded a trumpet note at the opening session in his brilliant historical essay on The Law of the Development of Religious Progress. The evening sermon by Dr. A. J. F. Behrends followed aptly. His text was John 4: 37: "One soweth and another reapeth." The fellowship of service in all ages, the permanence of true work, our advantage in reaping more than we have personally sown—these were the leading ideas of the discourse, which abounded in forcible and tender passages. At the Lord's Supper, which followed, Rev. N. S. Calhoun and Rev. Samuel Johnson officiated.

On Wednesday morning the business of the meeting was taken up with vigor and swiftly disposed of. Various committees brought in an account of their stewardship, among them Rev. A. F. Newton, in behalf of the committee on temperance, reported the activity of the committee in supporting and modifying the law requiring school instruction upon the physical effects of alcohol and narcotics, and urged the churches to watch the working of the new Raines Law, which is a wide departure from all former legislation.

Following the report of the committee on ministerial relief, Dr. N. H. Whittlesey felicitously showed the work and the needs of the national fund. Rev. E. N. Packard gave a full report of the committee of eight upon the proposed alliance with the Free Baptists of New York and northern Pennsylvania in the support and control of Keuka College, near Penn Yan. After amendments, declaring that the association assumes no legal control of the college nor makes any pecuniary pledges, a form of alliance was accepted by the association by a strong vote, and a provisional committee was appointed to assist in promoting the college project. Rev. N. S. Calhoun was subsequently appointed by this committee to superintend the preparatory work of arranging for a college class and to raise funds. Rev. S. E. Eastman and Rev. Dr. George H. Ball of Keuka supported the committee's appeal with impressive arguments.

At this session two valuable papers were presented. Rev. S. E. Eastman of Elmira took for his theme The Errand of Jesus, drawing upon comparative religion for his brilliant illustrations. The supreme errand of Jesus was to bring life, for which all the religions had been vainly seeking. The theme of Rev. H. N. Kinney of Syracuse was the Training of Children for the Church. Statistics of juvenile criminality and investigations into the quantity of religious knowledge which young children possess illustrated the urgent need of thorough training in word and doctrine. Some recent methods of accomplishing this end were happily presented.

Wednesday afternoon saw the meeting house crowded to its utmost capacity to hear an address by Dr. Lyman Abbott upon Christianity and Social Problems. Dr. Abbott was at his best in manner and method and carried away his audience with his portrayal of the historical movement which has taken away the power from the few and bestowed it upon the many in religious as in political matters. Following the address a new departure was made in turning over the association to the New York Branch of the Woman's Board, Mrs. E. N. Packard, re-elected president, conducted the service. The report of Miss Barden showed a gain of fifty per cent. in the receipts for the year, which were over $12,000. Miss Stanwood of Boston gave a rapid but clear sketch of the work of women in foreign missions and Miss M. W. Leitch made an impassioned and thrilling appeal for more consecration to the work.

Following the good custom of years, the entire session of Wednesday evening was devoted to the State Home Missionary Society. Special interest attended the exercises from the fact that Dr. W. A. Robinson, for twelve years president, declined re-election and ended his services of twenty-four years on the board by giving personal reminiscences of the formation of the society at Rochester and of important changes in methods, from time to time, in the history of the society. Dr. W. I. Buddington was the first president. Sec. Ethan Curtis read the annual report. It showed a marked advance in receipts, about $70,000 as against $60,000 of last year, the best showing since 1890. Many old churches have been renewed, advances made in several points, and revival interest of remarkable power has showed itself in several churches. Rev. W. B. Thorp gave a clear-cut, vigorous address upon The Future of Congregationalism in the State, which, he said, was now receiving more home missionary money than any other State but Massachusetts. There are two main objects before the society—the saving of life and the promotion of denominational growth. The former may well be left to the city churches, but the latter falls to the society. To rehabilitate worn out and feeble country churches, to plant new organizations in growing sections of our cities, is the society's peculiar work. He suggested grouping several weak country churches, with one able minister to itinerate among them, and the sending out of working bands from large central churches. Dr. W. E. Griffis followed in an unreportable speech, full of wit, fire and wisdom, abounding in historical illustrations, upon Cult, Creed and Life in Home Missionary Work. The New England "cult" had not trusted the liberty-loving peoples of Dutch, French and German birth. Our Calvinism was not essential, but life must be brought to the people. At the evening's close a pleasant reception was tendered by the ladies, and the delegates and townspeople mingled together without formal speeches.

Thursday, the last day, was full to the end and the interest suffered no abatement. Rev. C. W. Hardendorf gave a timely and incisive address upon the dangers from unrestricted immigration, cheap citizenship, bribery and corruption. In giving in his report as delegate to Oberlin Seminary and College Rev. W. A. Hobbs made a broad and able address upon ministerial education. One of the happiest arrangements of the provisional committee was the invitation to the eminent president of Auburn Seminary, Dr. H. M. Booth, to speak upon Christian Unity as Precedent to Church Unity. With a wealth of illustration, and in a delightful spirit, Dr. Booth insisted upon the deeper unity of love which tolerates variations of form in things nonessential.

Again, in the afternoon, the association gave way to the women, this time the Woman's Missionary Union taking the field, with Mrs. Dr. Kincaid, the president of the union, directing. A Few Figures by Mrs. J. J. Pearsall of Brooklyn showed about thirty-three per cent. gain in contributions for the year, which were over $13,000. Mrs. Ethan Curtis spoke briefly upon The Past and the Future, and then the secretaries, representing societies doing work in the homeland, followed each other in felicitous and effective words. Dr. W. A. Duncan began with work for the children. Dr. J. A. Hamilton, Dr. Woodbury, Dr. Cobb and Dr. Kincaid showed the multiform nature of our operations and needs. Dr. Woodbury dwelt upon the situation in Florida, and resolutions were adopted, on motion of Dr. Abbott, of sympathy for our teachers in Florida and support for the A. M. A. Resolutions favoring the movement towards international arbitration were submitted by Dr. Griffis and carried. Resolutions calling for the protection of our missionaries in Turkey were sent to Washington. Corporate members of the Board were put in nomination, and the whole session closed on Thursday evening with an address by Dr. A. H. Bradford upon the Outlook in Japan. Not dwelling upon the critical questions on which the deputation was sent, Dr. Bradford spoke at length to a crowded house, holding attention to every word, picturing the life and customs of the Japanese and giving a glowing tribute to the character of that people and to the ability and consecration of our missionaries. The attendance was quite up to the average, although some delegates traveled 700 miles in going and coming. E. N. P.

THE MICHIGAN ASSOCIATION.

To Greenville again, after fourteen years, the clans came. An ideal Western church is this; planted in the woods in 1854, it is strong and fruitful and keeps the New England traditions, having had only four pastors in all these years, and the fourth, Rev. A. M. Hyde, it has just installed. Much history has been made since 1882. Every pastor but two has left the State or died, but the 16,000 permanent Congregationalists have become 31,000. Young men now fill nearly all the prominent pulpits. Bradshaw, the retiring moderator, is a patriarch, though scarcely past forty, with his seven years' service at Ann Arbor. The packed program goes with a snap. There are no failures, no pauses. Papers, discussions, reports come fast. Nobody dares to be prosy. Not much theology is heard, but there is a new spirit, mostly practical. Rev. H. P. De Forest and Rev. William Knight discussed The Broadening of Church Activities. The former says the church is to "make better men," the latter says it ought to "make a better society." Rev. J. C. Cromer and Rev. C. F. Swift followed with keen speeches to prove that it ought to do both. Rev. Messrs. James Hyslop, H. S. Roblee and Thomas Chalmers, with spiritual touch, emphasized the deepening of Christian life. Rev. A. M. Brodie wittily described the men to whom he likes to preach, and E. L. Wright the preacher he likes to hear.

The three evening sessions were splendid rallies with crowded houses. Secretary Taintor told his story of the Mayflower Men with stereopticon. Rev. G. E. Albrecht, fresh from the Dosbisha, made a thrilling plea for the work in Japan. Secretary Warren, who found Mr. Albrecht in an Ohio factory and led him to Christ and to a splendid missionary career, marshaled a triplet of veteran home missionaries, and then threw upon the canvas the story of the Evolution of Michigan out of the pine woods and frontier villainy into a Christian life by the Home Missionary Society. Treasurer Sanderson is happy because the society has paid every obligation of the past year and has a cent to spare, which has been put into the permanent fund. The women's work is now wedded to the State work by the appointment of the president of the W. H. M. U., Mrs. I. P. Powell, on the board of trustees.

Sunday schools received marked attention and Superintendent Ewing keeps the churches alive about them. The A. M. A. is cordially backed by this association in its fight against the Sheats Law, and we spent two hours in hearing from its two seminaries and colleges and resolved generously in favor of all things good. Our paper, the Plymouth Weekly, is heartily encouraged to make as much money as it can. One new thing is to be marked, a Foreign Missionary Society is launched to co-operate with the American Board to push the interests in the State. No longer is the foreign work to be left to the tender mercies of a committee. A whole session is to be given to it and a man in every local association is appointed to have a care for the great command.

Dr. Nehemiah Boynton looked in toward the last and was received with enthusiasm for his own sake and for the reason that, in his coming, Massachusetts has been punished for taking away Dr. Davis. And so the association went home from its happiest, busiest session, rejoicing in its strength and growth, determined to keep up to the good record. D.

THE ILLINOIS STATE MEETING.

The fifty-third annual meeting was called to order Monday evening, May 18, in the beautiful city of Aurora, at the New England meeting house, Dr. J. M. Sturtevant, pastor. After a hearty address of welcome the sermon was preached by Rev. W. W. Leete of the First Church, Rockford. His text was Col. 1: 24, and his subject The Duty of Self-sacrifice. The sermon gave great satisfaction. Tuesday morning the association was organized by the choice of Pres. C. A. Blanchard as moderator, who presided with eminent fairness through all the sessions, and by strictly adhering to the program enabled the association to transact its necessary business in the time set apart for it. The devotional service, which occupied half an hour each morning of the three days' sessions, although one of the most interesting features of these State gatherings, seemed less impressive than usual. Indeed, the spiritual tone of this association seemed to many the lowest for years. The program gave the Illinois Home Missionary Society the lion's share of the time. The annual report was read by the secretary, Dr. James Tompkins, before it was put into the hands of those who were present at the association. It covered the work of the Chicago and Peoria missionary societies, as well as of the missionary pastors and evangelists of the State. The spiritual results of these departments of labor are encouraging. There have been few better years in this respect in our history. Although the total receipts have been nearly $58,000, the State society closes its financial year with about $3,000 deficit and sees little prospect of increasing its income to any perceptible extent the coming year. This means what resolutions passed reluctantly and after a good deal of discussion call for—efforts to reduce expenses in every department of the State missionary service.

During this morning session Secretary Hitchcock read a report of the condition of the theological seminary, and Rev. E. S. Carr a paper on Schleiermacher and the Christian Consciousness, in which the theory of the German professor and preacher was severely criticised. The interests of the American Board were briefly presented by Secretary Hitchcock and by Missionary Bissell of India. The latter, with burning and heartfelt eloquence, carried everything before him. He pleaded for an increase of gifts from the home churches, and portrayed the sad results of curtailing expenditures in the foreign field. The first two hours of the afternoon session, Mrs. Isaac Clafflin in the chair, were given to the representatives of the Woman's Home Missionary Union of the State. The review by the president indicated progress in every department of this missionary work. Mrs. Zillah F. Stevens in graphic language described the life and moral condition of the thousand people who make up the flatboat city of Peoria, and made it evident to all that heathenism exists in its most repulsive features at our very doors, and presents problems whose solution will call for years of the most self-denying service.

An encouraging account of work among the Negroes, especially at Beach Institute, Mobile, Ala., was given by Miss Ada L. Wilcox. Believing as she does that the colored race will finally take its proper place by the side of the ruling race of the country, she asks what is to be done for young women in whose veins there flows only a few drops of Negro blood, but who are yet excluded from the society for which both their education and their tastes fit them? An interesting story, weaving together the aims and accomplishments of the five home societies, was read by Mrs. J. T. Blanchard, after which the nature of the work undertaken by these societies was illustrated by living pictures, prepared and arranged by the women of the church whose guests we were. This feature of the afternoon session was both striking and effective.

In the hour that remained Rev. W. F. McMillen made a report of the Sunday school situation in the State, and Secretary Herrick enforced the demands of the Education Society, dividing his time with Miss Ada E. Wilson, who described the state of things in Utah and confirmed the conviction which many have had that Statehood for Utah means, most likely, permanence of Mormon rule. Years past there has been a good deal of complaint of crowded programs, with no time left for discussion. This year the program committee determined to leave time for discussion. Tuesday evening, therefore, after brief papers by Rev. J. B. Silcox and W. C. Miller in answer to the question, What Changes Are Needed in Modern Revival Methods? the subject was thrown open to the house. Mr. Silcox criticised the methods at present employed with considerable sharpness, declaring that on the whole they tend to make converts selfish and inefficient, rather than self-sacrificing and aggressive, that they present the Saviour as the dispenser of grace and not also as a king whose commands are to be implicitly obeyed, and that the opinion cherished by so many that results must be secured through what are known as revivals rather than through steady ingatherings is detrimental to the best interests of the kingdom of God.

No sooner was the subject open for discussion than men were on their feet to challenge the statements of the paper, and with such manifestation of feeling on the part of some as to lead a good many to hope that hereafter the old custom of a full program, with little opportunity for discussion, will be preserved. Nor were the discussions Wednesday afternoon on the policy to be pursued by the Home Missionary Society much more edifying than those of Tuesday evening. Wednesday morning came a paper on our academies by Dr. Eli Corwin, and another in an wer to the question, Are Our Ethical Standards Declining? by Rev. L. O. Baird of Ottawa, and a presentation of the interests of the Sunday School and Publishing Society by Secretary McMillen and Rev. C. W. Hiatt. Wednesday evening was also given up to the Home Missionary Society, the speeches being made by Rev. W. G. Puddefoot, who, as usual, swept everything before him, Rev. H. T. Wiard and Mrs. Caswell of New York. The remarks of Mr. Wiard and Mrs. Caswell were made more vivid by the use of the stereopticon.

Thursday morning, following the report on Ministerial Relief by Rev. G. W. Colman, and the passing of a good many resolutions on various matters which had been carefully considered in committee, was a paper by Rev. D. F. Fox, on The Church and the Young People, in which the dangers which beset the Christian Endeavor Societies of the country were carefully pointed out. Mr. Fox is a believer in these societies, but thinks that in many instances young people make the annual convention an end rather than definite Christian work, that they prefer their own meetings to attendance at church, and that their prayer meetings are in danger of becoming light and uninstructive. The society found many defenders although the dangers which Mr. Fox had pointed out could not be denied. Thursday afternoon brought a paper on Interdenominational Fellowship by Rev. Theodore Clifton, a narrative of the state of religion as given in the reports from the fourteen local associations of the State by Rev. G. H. Burgess, and a paper in the interests of the Church Building Society by Rev. G. H. Wilson of Paxton. The session closed with a communion service of much solemnity. Thursday evening was made a jubilee rally for the A. M. A. With Dr. Roy in charge it need not be said that every moment was full of interest. Men and women from the South were present, both to illustrate the work of the association in their own persons, and by their words appeal for its support.

Farewell words from the pastor with whose church we had met brought to a close the exercises of a gathering which on the whole was profitable, and which was attended by larger numbers than usual. Both at this meeting, as at some previous meetings, we suffered a good deal from the withdrawal during the sessions of the corporate members of the State Home Missionary Society to attend to business which ought to be attended to when the regular meetings are not going on. No man cares to prepare a paper to be read before the association and then have the leading men of the State fail to give him a hearing because unfortunate arrangements compel them to be elsewhere during the half-hour assigned to the consideration of his topic. Better fewer sessions when all are present than those we now have with so many absent from them. Superb weather and the abounding hospitality of the people of Aurora left nothing that the most exacting could have wished. FRANKLIN.

FROM THE HAWKEYE STATE.

The revival spirit seems to have stirred our churches more this season than for several years. In a good many towns there has been a general revival, and hundreds have professed faith in Christ. Evangelists have done good work; neighboring pastors have rendered valuable assistance; earnest workers on the field have been important factors. Under the leadership of evangelists general revivals have taken place in Cedar Falls, Waterloo, Marion and Dubuque. All the churches in these places have received large additions to membership. Many of the smaller churches have added from fifty to seventy-five per cent. to their membership during the winter, and a few have more than doubled their membership. The little church at Fayette had a precarious existence for a time. In 1895 it reported a membership of only twenty-five. Rev. J. E. Snowden proved to be just the man for the place. The church building has been enlarged, but it is too small to accommodate the congregations, including the 110 converts received at one time. Salem has had a similar experience. A few months ago it had a membership of about eighty. Under the leadership of Rev. J. P. Dyas more than 150 have been added to the church. Many other small churches have been graciously quickened. The results of these revivals are not to be measured by the lengthened church rolls alone. Increased activity is apparent in many lines. Though the State suffers from the hard times it raised its portion of the American Board debt, and the home missionary debt of about $1,500 at the close of the year was entirely raised in three days after a final appeal.

The Endeavor Societies are becoming active in several lines of sociological work. They are waging war against the slot-machines, the cigarette and like evils. They have been active in working for the separation of youthful and hardened criminals in our prisons, and at Christmas sent each inmate of our penitentiaries a small remembrance which was highly appreciated. They also sent an Easter letter to each convict.

The legislature did not accomplish much in the line of reforms. Many are thankful, however, that it did not do worse. The bill to legalize the manufacture of liquors within the State failed by a few votes. The age of consent was raised from thirteen to fifteen and the good people of the State will continue their fight in this line until the age is made eighteen. The act to prohibit the sale of cigarettes was ridiculed by many leading papers, but it passed notwithstanding.

The fiftieth anniversary of good Dr. Salter's pastorate at Burlington was an event full of an interest not limited to the Congregational fellowship. For fifty-three years Dr. Salter has been identified with every interest that has contributed to the moral welfare of the State, and all are glad to do him honor. His host of friends hope and pray that he may long be spared. This anniversary and others soon to follow remind us that Iowa is beginning to take on age, at least what we call age west of the Father of Waters. The semi-centennial of Iowa's admission into the Union will soon be celebrated. Preparations for the event are now under way, and it is conceded on all sides that Burlington is the place for the celebration, since it was the seat of government even while Iowa was a part of Wisconsin Territory. The Territory of Iowa was organized in 1838 and Burlington continued to be the capital for three years. The legislature met at Old Zion Church, the first brick church edifice erected in the State. The population of the territory at that time was less than 50,000. Iowa had a stormy time in organizing the State government. The proposed constitution was rejected twice, largely because the people did not like the boundaries fixed by Congress. The work was finally accomplished with wonderful dispatch. The legislature passed an act in January, 1846, providing for an election in April to select delegates to a constitutional convention. That body met May 4, and the constitution then drawn up was adopted by the people Aug. 3 following. The vote indicates the small population, for at an election so full of excitement only about 18,000 votes could be polled. This quick legislative work was done without the aid of railroads or telegraph lines.

Massachusetts.

CHELSEA.—Central. The stir which has recently occurred by reason of the call of the pastor, Rev. C. E. Jefferson, to the far West has meant vastly more to his church and city than the neighborhood could have anticipated at first. The esteem of its citizens for the righteous civic reforms he has led during his pastorate, the respect of brother minis- ters, the affection of his flock and the love of the whole community have all been intensely empha- sized during this period of uncertainty. A consid- eration of the success of the pastor's service here leaves no room for surprise at such a flood of pro- test against his departure, and now there is great rejoicing.

MILFORD.—First. This church is in a flourishing condition. Thirteen persons have been received since Jan. 1. The present membership is 287. The benevolences last year were $1,610. In addition to the usual contributions since Jan. 1, the church gave $125 to Armenian relief. The pastor, Rev. Webster Woodbury, gives addresses Sunday even- ings, illustrated with the stereopticon. The several organizations of the church are doing good work.

BRIDGEWATER.—Central Square. The church tendered to Rev. and Mrs. E. S. Porter a reception, May 15, upon the completion of seven years of pas- toral service. During this time there has been quiet but constant growth in all departments, $18,- 000 have been raised for current expenses and im- provements, and the average contributions for be- nevolence have been nearly doubled, aggregating $4,051. There have been 87 additions to the mem- bership, 49 on confession, a net increase of 14 per cent. The present membership is 259.

SOUTHBRIDGE.—The women of the society have renovated the parsonage thoroughly, painting, pa- pering and calcimining the rooms.

WORCESTER.—First Swedish has purchased the Salem Street property for $40,000, and is to be con- gratulated on securing so fine a house, well situ- ated and equipped.——Piedmont meeting house will be closed during the pastor's vacation and undergo extensive repairs. The church accepts the invitation of Pilgrim Church for worship during that time.——Pilgrim. The women held their an nual "baby reception" last week. About 100 of the little ones were present. This has proved a most happy and profitable feature of the church. ——Plymouth. May 17 Dr. McCullagh commemo- rated the 25th anniversary of his ordination by a sermon reviewing his work and its lessons. He was called to this pastorate in 1890. Although but six years in the city, he is, with one exception, the senior pastor. The church under his pastorate has added 225 names to its roll, contributed $61,656 for home expenses and $175,626 for missions at home and abroad. The following Tuesday evening a re- ception was tendered by the church.

WEST SPRINGFIELD.—Park has voted to extend a call to Rev. A. E. Fitch of Utica, N. Y., to become the pastor of the church. Mr. Fitch is one of six candidates who have recently supplied the pulpit. He is a young man and a member of the class of '96 of Auburn Theological Seminary.

Maine.

MADISON.—Mr. F. A. Fuller of the Graduating Class of Bangor Seminary assumes charge of this church. During the four years' service of Rev. J. H. Matthews the church has become self-support- ing, has had an accession to its membership of about 30 persons and has built a new edifice cost- ing $12,000.

BIDDEFORD.—Second. The top of the spire was recently struck during a thunderstorm, in the same manner as last year. The repairs to the vane, necessitated by the former stroke, had not been undertaken, and the damages of this second occa- sion were not very serious.

New Hampshire.

BARNSTEAD PARADE.—The first church edifice built here in 1760 was of logs. The location is now marked by a few scattered stones. The first framed structure in the town was erected in 1796. It is proposed the present season to commemorate its 100th anniversary by appropriate services. To this end members of the society are perfecting arrangements, and will send letters of invitation to the descendants of all the old families dwelling there during the early history of the church. The event will probably occur in June, and promises to be an occasion of great interest. It is a fact worthy to be chronicled that two pastors conducted its services for 84 years, Rev. Enos George 54, and Rev. W. O. Carr 30.

MEREDITH.—As a direct outgrowth of the past four months of union work by the three denominations Evangelist Ralph Gillam spent the first two weeks of May here. His methods were beyond criticism and his work was strong. He gained a marked influence among the business and working men. All business was suspended one afternoon. The community attests to the fact of never having been so moved before. A good number of persons decided to start in the Christian life.

MARLBORO.—The Finlanders at the "Quarry," few of whom can speak English, have recently organized a total abstinence society and expect to have a Lutheran missionary about once a month. Rev. J. S. Colby, who has withdrawn his resignation of the pastorate, to the joy of his people, will do such service as he can for them at other times. As a class they are industrious and worthy.

LANCASTER.—The church has met with a great loss in the recent death of Charles E. Allen who for nearly 30 years was chorister and leader of the singing in the Sunday school and prayer meetings. He was a valuable assistant of the pastor, never refusing the help desired if able to render it.

CONCORD.—South. A large audience was present at the farewell services in the old chapel previous to its demolition to give place to the new one to be built the present season.

HILLSBORO CENTER.—The King's Daughters, "in a financial experience meeting," lately told how they have raised $50, to be expended in needed improvements on the parsonage.

Connecticut.

NEW HAVEN.—The Connecticut Association of Working Girls' Clubs held its sixth annual meeting, May 20, at Center Church Chapel. An evening meeting at Lenox Hall was attended by a large audience of working girls.——The C. E. union of the city and vicinity held a large meeting at Westville, May 21. A stirring address on Soul Winning was given by H. B. Gibbud of the Rescue Mission of Syracuse, N. Y.——Plymouth. The pastor, Dr. W. W. McLane, is giving an extended series of lectures on The Bible in the Creeds of the Church.

BRIDGEPORT.—The 11th annual meeting of the Women's H. M. U. was held with the First Church, May 20. Among the speakers were Pres. S. B. L. Penrose of Whitman College, Mrs. C. H. Taintor, Miss M. D. Moffatt and Rev. G. H. Gutterson.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

SALAMANCA.—The church held its annual meeting May 5. The membership has increased during the year by 16 and all bills are paid. Rev. M. L. Dalton begins his sixth year as pastor with better prospect than ever.

New Jersey.

GLEN RIDGE.—This growing church now publishes a monthly of unusual excellence. It is an eight-page paper called The Polished Arrow and is devoted to the unification and strengthening of the many activities of the church. It is sold by subscription and is also systematically given away. The new Lend-a-Hand Club of boys for "the development of Christian manhood" continues to do well, and there has now been added to the several young people's and children's societies a "Cradle Roll" for children under seven. The mission band, with which it is connected, has been active in working for the needy in this country and for a little girl in a kindergarten in Cæsarea, Turkey. The senior circle of King's Daughters has done much among the poor in Bloomfield, and has united with other circles in that place in establishing a kindergarten. The standing committee has recently issued a handsome church manual.

PARK RIDGE.—The pastor, Rev. Charles Hellliwell, has just completed his seventh year of service, and celebrated the event by a special anniversary sermon, giving both retrospect and prospect. The church is growing in numbers, having increased 25 per cent. within a year, and also in the confidence of the community, as is shown by the increased attendance at the services and the larger number of calls for pastoral service. A double quartet of trained singers has been formed, much to the help of the evening service. The King's Daughters recently gave a successful cantata, and the Sunday school boys' Flute and Drum Corps, of which the pastor is flute instructor, continues to do well.

THE SOUTH.

Florida.

The church at Panasoffkee, sadly in need of a house of worship, is about to build.——Rev. E. P. Herrick of the Tampa church has from time to time preached a brief sermon in Spanish before the regular sermon Sunday evening.——On May 19, the first anniversary of the death of Marti, 180 Cubans were addressed by Mr. Herrick in the Cuban chapel in Ibor City.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

ZANESVILLE.—Some who attended the council to dismiss Rev. D. I. Jones believed they were attending the funeral of the church, but since the coming of Rev. C. H. Hanks, two and one-half years ago, there has been a steady and substantial growth. Over 100 members have been added and the congregations have steadily increased, a troublesome debt has been almost removed and the pastor and people are heartily united.

AKRON.—First. Rev. T. E. Monroe has just completed his 23d year, the longest pastorate of any minister now serving in the State. There have been in the last year 55 additions, 44 on confession, with no outside help.——Arlington Street reports the whole community interested in the preaching of the gospel by Rev. E. T. McMahon, the pastor.

TWINSBURGH.—One year ago Rev. W. A. Swengel was called for one year. The work has been so satisfactory that he has been engaged permanently. Within the year there have been about a dozen accessions. A new roof tower clock and other improvements have been added to the house.

Indiana.

ELKHART.—Rev. F. E. Knopf has closed his seventh year here and has accepted its hearty invitation to remain. At the meeting good reports came in from all departments. All debts are paid and money remains in the treasury. The basement of the church edifice, it was decided, should be finished off at a cost of $600. A part has been already pledged. It will be used for Sunday school and social rooms. Fifteen persons have been added to the church on confession and one by letter the past year.

ONTARIO.—The pastor, Rev. J. R. Preston, has recently had the assistance of Evangelist G. H. Jackson in a series of meetings, which, notwithstanding the springtime work of the farmers, were well attended and resulted in much good to the church. A number of persons gave themselves to Christ, of whom five united at the May communion. Mr. Jackson is now assisting Mr. Preston in protracted meetings with the new church in Shipshewana.

TERRE HAUTE.—First. At the midweek meeting, May 13, Dr. J. H. Crum's resignation was accepted by a small majority, although there was much opposition to his going. Resolutions of respect and commendation were unanimously adopted. Dr. Crum feels that the old church edifice should be replaced by a modern building, and that another pastor may be able to do more aggressive work in this direction.

INDIANAPOLIS.—Plymouth. The unveiling of a portrait of the late Rev. O. C. McCulloch occurred May 21. Prof. W. A. Bell made the presentation speech and Miss Ruth McCulloch removed the draperies. The pastor, Rev. F. E. Dewhurst, accepted the gift in the name of the church. Mr. T. C. Steele, the artist, whose present effort is considered a marked success, was a special friend of the deceased charity leader.

ALEXANDRIA.—Rev. T. C. Smith, who accepts the call of this new church, has been one of the instructors in the Bible School of Butler College, an institution which has recently passed from the control of the Disciple denomination and become an integral part of the new Indianapolis University. Mr. Smith was formerly a missionary in Jamaica and is a young man of much ability and earnestness.

Wisconsin.

BUTTERNUT.—The dedication of the new edifice occurred May 10. Rev. T. G. Grassie preached the sermon and Rev. H. C. Todd offered the prayer.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

KANSAS CITY.—First. The 10th annual meeting of the Ladies' Union was held April 17. This is made a gala occasion each year, the whole congregation being invited. Reports showed that $2,827 had been expended during the year in various lines of home and foreign missions. The young women gave $100 for missions and carried on a kitchen garden.

Minnesota.

MINNEAPOLIS.—Bethany gave a reception to its new pastor, Rev. J. W. Heyward. He finds the people responsive and is building up a good congregation.——Forest Heights, organized 18 months ago, has a property worth $4,000, with no debt except $500 to the C. C. B. S. Since the coming, April 1, of the present pastor, Rev. R. A. Hadden, 14 members have been received, seven upon confession. A promising Boys' Brigade is a prominent feature. A reception was recently tendered the pastor.

ST. PAUL.—Olivet has made substantial progress during the year, having reduced its debt, erected an addition to its building for social purposes, and received a large number of additions upon confession, the result of a revival. Several members of downtown churches also have united, so that it has considerable strength.——Pacific has received the promise of substantial aid from the C. C. B. S., and hopes to unite with the Presbyterian church on a Congregational basis.

BROWNTON AND STEWART.—This field has met all financial obligations during the year, reduced the amount of aid asked for from the H. M. S. and reports additions to membership.

STEWARTVILLE.—Progress has been made but some financial obligations are pressing, with other discouragements which are met in a hopeful spirit.

The church in Hutchinson has called a pastor who will move into the new parsonage which has just been secured.

North Dakota.

CRARY.—Rev. U. G. Rich, assisted by Rev. E. H. Stickney, organized a church of nine members, May 10. The work is hopeful. It is expected that a meeting house will be erected this season.

FARGO.—Evangelist C. N. Hunt of Minneapolis is holding special meetings in the armory, supported by the united efforts of the city pastors. Much interest is manifested.

Rev. Isaac B. Tracy, just beginning work at Grand Forks, finds the church in good condition. Eleven persons were recently received to membership.——Special meetings are being held at Williston, Evangelist W. H. Gimblett assisting the pastor, Rev. George Extence. Deep interest is manifest.

Colorado.

CRIPPLE CREEK.—Later accounts of the fire show that in addition to the loss of the house of worship, the parsonage, largely built by the pastor, was destroyed. The loss was large, exclusive of insurance. The meeting house will be rebuilt at once on the old site.

HIGHLAND LAKE.—A new house of worship will be erected this summer, the result of a trip east by the enterprising pastor, Rev. Mary G. Bumstead, and of the generous response of the people on her return.

Oklahoma.

MORRISON.—The new edifice was dedicated May 17, Supt. J. H. Parker preaching the sermon. Evangelist L. J. Parker has assisted the pastor, Rev. C. J. Rives, in special meetings for a week.

OKLAHOMA CITY.—A reception was given, May 6, to Rev. Joel Harper, the incoming pastor, and his wife, and to Rev. O. C. Burhans and wife, who are just leaving the field.

Rev. R. B. Foster will leave Perkins Aug. 1 to take charge of the training school at Kingfisher.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

SAN DIEGO.—First. This church, since its organization 10 years ago, has worshiped in temporary quarters. Although growing in numbers and spiritual strength, the financial problem involved in a permanent building has seemed beyond solution. At the annual meeting in February it was unanimously voted that the work of securing a lot and church edifice be undertaken at once, and at a public meeting held May 10, under the inspiring leadership of the pastor, Dr. S. A. Norton, subscriptions amounting to $16,800 were made amid great enthusiasm. Of this total $8,000 were pledged in seven amounts. All gave generously, even to the point of sacrifice.

PASO ROBLES.—By unanimous action, after investigation through a committee, the San Bernardino Association of Congregational Churches and Ministers adopted a report of the credential committee, which closes as follows: "In view of all this evidence and the fact that Mr. King, though cited, refuses to answer charges, we recommend that Earl Russell King be expelled from the San Bernardino District Association. And we further recommend that the churches and general public be warned against this man as dangerous and unworthy." This action has been communicated to under the official signature of the registrar of association.

OTHER CHRISTIAN WORK.

Northfield will this year, as heretofore, be the Mecca of multitudes of Christian Pilgrims through the summer months. The World's Student Conference from June 26 to July 5 follows hard upon the graduation exercises of Mount Hermon and Northfield Seminary, and the General Conference for Bible study is scheduled from July 30 to August 16, while the Y. M. C. A. encampment, initiated last year, will be a feature of the entire summer, and a kindergarten is to be held simultaneously. The Young Women's Conference will last from July 10 to 20. The list of speakers at these various gatherings includes besides such familiar favorites as Mr. Moody and Dr. Mackenzie, Robert E. Speer, Rev. R. A. Torrey, Rev. F. B. Meyer, Major Whittle, Prof. R. E. Thompson of Philadelphia, and Charles T. Studd of Cambridge University and perhaps Prebendary Webb-Peploe.

Toronto, long distinguished for its Sunday observance and sometimes called the City of Churches, was favored, May 3, by the enterprise of the Evening Telegram, with a canvass of church attendance. In a population estimated at 200,000, 203 edifices with a seating capacity of 112,852 were visited, and the attendance on all services numbered 123,991, an increase of five per cent. over that of Dec. 22, 1888, when a similar canvass was made under rather less favorable conditions. In this army of worshipers Methodists head the list with 32,770, Presbyterians and Anglicans follow with 22,749 and 20,676, respectively, and Hebrews bring up the rear with 795. The attendance in Congregational churches was 5,980.

The Y. M. C. A. of Bangor, Me., acknowledges another gift of $1,000 from Rev. and Mrs. G. W. Field, D. D.

Although I am not a member of any church organization, I never want to live in any community in which there are not churches and church organizations. I never want to live in a community where the church bell does not break the stillness of the Sabbath morning and call the inhabitants of that locality to the worship of the Supreme Being. I never want to live in a community or see a country where the songs of the Master cannot be sung by his children as they may see fit to sing them upon the Sabbath and on other occasions.—Senator Allen of Nebraska.

A NEEDED GLASS.

This large Hall Mirror suggests an opportunity for reflection.

There is no single apartment in the house where a mirror is really so much needed as in the hall. Yet the only mirror in most halls is a mere hand-glass framed between the hooks of a hat stand.

Do not forget that the effect of a large mirror is always to make the hall look larger. This is important in view of the small dimensions of the average hall. Then, too, it is placed where you can have the constant use of it. Every person leaving the house has the benefit of it.

This pattern, by the way, is a very unusual design, the entire mirror being projected about three inches in front of the plane of the frame, and it is most distinguished in appearance.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

PILGRIM HALL, CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, MAY 22.

Mrs. S. B. Capron, whose name will always be associated in our minds with the Madura Mission, was the leader of the meeting. The Scripture lesson was taken from the epistles to the seven churches. The promises to him that overcometh indicate progression in spiritual life. These promises range from possession of eternal life to sharing the counsels, plans and victories of the triumphant Redeemer on his throne.

Mrs. Capron called attention to the objects of prayer that had been on the calendar for the week, including native women in Turkey, village schools in western Turkey and the girls' boarding school in Adabazar. Letters were read from Mrs. Parsons of Bardezag, who spoke of the "happy effects" from "the direful events" in Turkey in the general sympathy for the sufferers. The Bardezag people had offered generous contributions of money and made up garments of cloth which they had woven for the needy ones in the villages. Religious interest had been deepened and a second weekly prayer meeting, numbering sometimes 130, was attended by even more Gregorians than Protestants. An appreciative letter by Pastor Mahshegian to the Worcester Branch was next read. "There are between us very ample oceans," he wrote, "but the love of Christ brings us to each other very near."

A letter of April 9 from Miss Farnham, teacher in the girls' boarding school in Adabazar, told of the comforting Easter service, at which time eleven members were received into the church, six of them "our own girls." She wrote of the sacrifice of the "small girls" who "took, each of them, one of their dresses and cut them up to make 'shalvars,'" which "were forwarded to the interior." A few words were read from Misses Sheldon and Hyde, whose names, also, were on the calendar, and who were associated with Miss Farnham in the girls' boarding school and in the kindergarten recently started in Adabazar. Crowded meetings during the Week of Prayer recommended by the Evangelical Alliance on behalf of the suffering Christians of Anatolia were reported from the Nicomedia field.

A letter from Miss Carrie E. Bush of Harpoot was read by her former associate there, Mrs. J. K. Browne. It was a story of relief work, an encouraging report of growing Christian interest, a plea for "money, money, money to build churches," and a touching account of the farewells to the missionaries, who, after more than thirty years of labor in that field, are coming to this country broken down in health. Mrs. Schneider read the last letter, from the widow of the martyr pastor of Sivas, whose last sermon to his beloved people was preached from the text, "The very hairs of your head are all numbered."

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

While there is no increase in the volume of general trade, there is, nevertheless, a distinctly better feeling. There is more confidence in the future and merchants talk in a more hopeful strain than they have for some time. The more confident feeling is due somewhat to the decreasing number of failures.

The trade in boots and shoes is active. The demand runs heavily on the cheaper grades, but nearly all shoe manufacturers have enough orders booked to keep them busy for some time to come. This activity has stimulated somewhat quotations for hides and leather, although good authorities are not looking for much of an advance in leather values until after July 1. The stagnation in wool and woolens continues, and the raw material moves at scarcely steady prices. In cotton manufacturing there is a slightly better tone, especially in the print cloth market at Fall River. Iron and steel continue dull and trade conditions throughout the West are given as unsatisfactory.

Speculative energy on the stock exchanges is all but benumbed, especially in Wall Street. In Boston we have had some activity in copper stocks, but the public is extremely wary. If the price of copper continues strong and advances to twelve cents, as it gives promise of doing, Boston's group of copper mining stocks will attract attention at advancing prices. Dominion coal and Bay State gas are expected to be active and sell higher when the governor signs the Whitney Fuel Gas Bill.

The matter of railroad earnings is too favorable a factor to let pass without mention. For the first quarter of the current year the total gross earnings of 132 companies, owning about two-thirds of the total mileage of the country, aggregated $177,070,325, which was a gain over last year of 7 per cent.; net earnings increased 9.8 per cent. The so-called granger group of roads made the best showing with an increase in gross of 17.8 per cent. and 22.8 per cent. in net over last year.

METHODISTS DENOUNCE THE SHEATS LAW.

The text of the resolutions passed by the General Conference, condemning the Florida Sheats Law, follows:

Resolved, 1. That the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church sincerely deprecates the passage of such a law in any State, which invades the personal rights and liberties of our people in a manner repugnant to the genius of our Christian civilization, and, as we believe, in violation of the rights and liberties of those engaged in educating people of divers races in our land.

2. That we sympathize with our Congregational brethren in the heroic stand which they have taken to resist the enforcement of this law, and that, should a similar issue be made by the arrest, under the provision of this act, of any of the officers of either of our societies having charge of our educational work in the State of Florida, or of teachers in either of our institutions in that State, we will heartily approve any efforts that may be made to contest the constitutionality or secure the repeal of a law so un-American and un-Christian.

TWICE TOLD WORTH.—A piece of furniture is twice as valuable when it is cleverly placed where it serves a double purpose, or where it is twice as often used. For example, a large mirror, if placed in the hall, will be worth almost double what it would be worth in a library or living-room. ## BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. JAMES W. HUBBELL, D.D.,

Who died in Mansfield, O., May 19, after an extended illness, was born in Wilton, Ct., March 29, 1835, and was graduated from Yale in 1857. After teaching for two or three years he entered Union Seminary and was ordained in 1864. The same year he took charge of the church in Milford, Ct., and after five years' service became pastor of the College Street (now Plymouth) Church of New Haven, where he remained another five years, and at length was settled over the First Church, Danbury, but was not in the active ministry for several years prior to his death. He was prominent and influential in denominational affairs.

REV. CHARLES W. BIRD

Died at the Sanitarium in Alma, Mich., May 6, at the early age of forty-four, from a tumor on the brain. He was born in Bethlehem, Ct., and received his education at Williston Seminary and Yale College and Divinity School, being graduated from the latter in 1880. He was first ordained to the work of a home missionary in Minnesota and his arduous service somewhat undermined his health, so that a year's rest in New England became necessary. He had been pastor at Portland, Mich., for five years, where he greatly endeared himself to the people.

REV. WILLIAM SEWALL

Was born in Boston, Mass., Dec. 14, 1827. His early education was in the Roxbury Latin School. He was graduated at Harvard University in 1849, and after some years of teaching in Lewiston, Me., took his theological course at Bangor, with a post-graduate course at Andover. He was ordained at Lunenburg, Vt., in 1855; was called from there to Norwich, Vt., in 1865, where his pastorate covered eleven years. He was next settled at Littleton, Mass., and after a five years' ministry he labored for shorter periods in Vermont and Massachusetts churches. For the last four years his home has been with his son, Rev. J. L. Sewall, pastor of the Clyde Congregational Church, Kansas City, Mo. In this period he has ministered with great usefulness to some of the churches of Missouri and Arkansas, and up to last February he supplied the Ivanhoe Park church in the suburbs of Kansas City. For the last three months he has suffered greatly from increasing disease, and died May 15. Memorial services were held in Clyde Church, May 17, and the burial was from the Congregational church in Norwich, Vt.

ANNIVERSARY AT YALE DIVINITY SCHOOL.

The exercises at New Haven began Sunday evening, May 17, when Dr. A. H. Bradford of Montclair, N. J., gave the anniversary address at Center Church meeting house on The Unity of the Spirit a World-wide Necessity. He regards sectarianism as the great ill of Christendom, and recounted many telling instances out of his experiences during a recent visit to Japan. Altogether the picture was a dark one and emphasized the need of unity of spirit rather than union as to form and name.

The Commencement exercises were held Wednesday morning in Battell Chapel, and included speaking by representatives of the graduating class, with an address to the class by Prof. George Adam Smith. The list of speakers and their themes follows: The Grounds of the Preacher's Optimism, C. W. Collier; The Popular Preacher, G. A. Bushee; Social and Individual Redemption, E. C. Wheeler; The Preacher as a Social Reformer, T. N. Baker; Obedience and Power, W. M. Short; The Young Man and the Church, J. H. Grant; Supernaturalism in Preaching, A. G. Beach; Personality and the Problems of the Day, C. N. Thorp. The addresses were, in the main, devoted to the discussion of practical problems.

Professor Smith gave a simple, telling address. His subject was The Christian Congregation. It is the means, he said, in the hands of its leaders for uplifting and evangelizing the world, and he urged the men to give thought to the spiritual and practical needs of their people.

The annual meeting of the alumni was held in Marquand Chapel in the afternoon. Professor Fisher presided and the discussion was on The Present Tendency to Subordinate in Preaching the Religious to the Ethical Side of the Gospel. It was opened by Rev. J. W. Bixler and Rev. G. H. Beard. It was held that the present tendency on the whole is good as a part of the spirit of the times. But what we want, the speakers urged, is not ethical preaching to the exclusion of religious truth, but an ethical interpretation and presentation of the great truths of religion. Rev. J. H. Twichell spoke of the newer method of urging children to be Christians because they are by nature God's children and belong to him, as opposed to the older method of teaching that mankind was naturally alien to God. Prof. G. A. Smith said that he thought the problem did not exist in his county as a special one. The discussion was concluded by a vigorous address by Prof. Samuel Harris. In the evening a reception was tendered Professor Smith and the graduating class in the Lowell Mason Social Room, President and Mrs. Dwight and Professor Fisher receiving.

Ten of the alumni have died during the year. The average age was seventy-two. Prof. George E. Day's resignation as secretary of the alumni was accepted with regret, and a vote of thanks was tendered him for his long and earnest service. The committee appointed last year to report a plan for an alumni organization reported through Rev. D. M. James. A permanent organization was formed with the following officers: president, Dr. T. T. Munger, '55; vice-president, Rev. D. M. James, '88; secretary, Rev. H. A. Bridgman, '87; treasurer, Rev. W. J. Mutch, '85.

A WISE CONSOLIDATION OF ACADEMIES.

TILLOTSON AND CUTLER UNITE.

At the close of the present school year Tillotson Academy, now located at Trinidad, Col., will be consolidated with Cutler Academy, the preparatory department of Colorado College, located at Colorado Springs. All the property, including real estate, buildings and equipment, will be deeded to the latter institution, and arrangements will be made by which the graduates of Tillotson shall become alumni of Cutler Academy.

This step has been taken after mature deliberation, during which one of the secretaries of the societies interested made a thorough examination on the field of all the questions involved. When Tillotson was founded there was an urgent call for such an institution in the locality where it was placed. Its history has proved the wisdom of the choice. For sixteen years it has occupied a commanding position in the educational work of southern Colorado. Under the wise and energetic leadership of Prof. Henry E. Gordon, who has been its principal from the beginning, it has stood with unswerving loyalty for the securing of Christlike character as the aim of all education. In the steady pursuit of this aim it has secured a place among the best institutions of the State, gained a more than State-wide patronage and sent forth as graduates young men and women who have become a force for Christian civilization wherever they have gone.

But since the early days conditions have entirely changed. Now an excellent high school is doing effectively the local work and the adjoining region can be successfully reached from Colorado Springs. There are great advantages, also, for students in Colorado Springs which could not be offered at Trinidad. These and other considerations, including the financial aspect of the case, that one large institution in a central locality can employ more economically and effectively the available funds than two institutions in separate fields, have brought the societies which have supplied the money for Tillotson and the trustees of Colorado College and Cutler Academy to this important decision.

The transfer of the property to Colorado Springs is made with the understanding that a new dormitory shall, in the near future, be erected on the college grounds, to bear the name of Tillotson Hall, thus perpetuating the memory of the academy and of the noble man for whom it was named. Plans are already being matured for securing the funds to erect this new building.

Prof. Henry E. Gordon, who has been principal of the academy since it was founded, and to whose enthusiasm and unwearying energy the large success of its work has been due, has accepted a position on the faculty of Colorado College and will give important assistance in the work of Cutler Academy. He will be a valuable addition to the corps of teachers, bringing to his work here large experience in teaching and a very wide knowledge of the State. He belongs to a family well known in this country for its energy and achievements. His father was for many years treasurer of the American Board. One sister, Mrs. Alice Gordon Gulick, formerly a teacher at Mt. Holyoke College, is now at the head of the remarkably successful girls' school at San Sebastian, Spain. Another sister, Miss Anna Gordon, has for twenty years been the constant companion and helper of Miss Frances Willard.

The consolidation of the two academies is a forward step in the movement of higher education in Colorado, and will have great influence in still further building up the already large educational interests of Colorado Springs.

The Story of

Puritana.

Prof. Dixi Crosby, M. D., LL. D., who for thirty-two years was at the head of Dartmouth Medical College, belonged to the famous Crosby family of physicians, which for several generations has furnished more distinguished medical men than any other family in America. His father was Dr. Asa Crosby, of Dartmouth, who procured the charter of the State medical society, of which he was for thirty years a conspicuous member; one brother, Dr. Josiah Crosby, invented the invalid bed and the method of making extensions of fractured limbs by adhesive strips; another brother, Dr. Thos. R. Crosby, was chief surgeon in Columbian College Hospital during the war, and later professor of animal and vegetable physiology at Dartmouth College; while Dr. Dixi Crosby himself was the inventor and discoverer of various important improvements in medicine and surgery, including a new and unique mode of reducing metacarpophalangeal dislocation, opening of abscess at hip-joint, etc., etc.

At the early age of twenty-four his extraordinary skill and success in overcoming disease had already attracted the attention of medical men throughout the world, and won for him the highest honors. His greatest achievement was the discovery of an original method for perfecting and compounding in permanent form what has become known as his "prize formula," and which, under the name of Puritana, is legally protected.

The foundation of this remarkable medical discovery consists of simple New England roots and herbs, and the original family recipe for it has descended to the long line of Crosby physicians from their Puritan ancestors. Its peculiar vegetable composition rendered it necessary to brew it whenever needed in the early days of its history, and after the scattering of the Puritan families to remote localities, where the necessary ingredients were not to be found, many attempts were made to put it up in permanent form, all of which failed until Dr. Dixi Crosby discovered means and methods, the result of which is: Nature's Cure compounded in the laboratory of Common Sense.

It cures from head to foot.

Puritana

Nature's Cure

For diseases of the Stomach, Liver, Heart, Blood, Kidneys

And for Weak Lungs, Starved Nerves, Fagged Brain

It cures after everything else has failed. It cures cases that have been given up as hopeless. It cures pleasantly. It cures positively. It cures permanently.

Puritana is the prize formula of Prof. Dixi Crosby, M. D., LL. D., for over 30 years at the head of Dartmouth Medical College.

Get of your druggist this great disease-conquering discovery (the price is $1 for the complete treatment, consisting of one bottle of Puritana, one bottle of Puritana Pills, and one bottle of Puritana Tablets, all enclosed in one package) or write us, and you will bless the day when you heard of Puritana. ## MUSIC IN RELATION TO WORSHIP.

At the Boston Ministers' Meeting on Monday Rev. J. O. Haarvig spoke on the ways in which music may become an aid to spiritual worship and may deepen the power of spiritual expression. He referred to the close connection which has always existed between music and worship and to the devotional spirit of the famous old composers. Music must be an integral part of the services of the church, not merely an ornamental accessory, for a service with poetry and not piety is Pharisaism. Music must be properly placed in the service, and of a worshipful, dignified and reverent character. Sensational preaching and frivolous music are responsible for much of the irreverence of today. The special praise or vesper service is in danger of becoming merely a sacred concert, and to be spiritually helpful the congregation must have a part in it and a place must be made for the ministry of the word. Mr. Haarvig expressed the hope that the boy choir fad would never invade Congregational churches. This assertion was applauded. Congregations should be impressed with the thought that their singing of the hymns is not only an act of worship but a testimony to the world of their faith and joy in the Lord.

The discussion which followed emphasized the feeling that the organist and choir should be Christians, and brought out the fact that in the minds of many present the ideal church music is furnished by the congregation led in its singing by a chorus choir.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

It is now regarded as altogether probable that the difficulties about railroad rates that prevented the convention from being held at San Francisco last year will be removed, so that the convention can meet there next year, and that a rate of $50 for the round trip between Chicago and San Francisco will be granted.

For June the topic of the World's Christian Endeavor Prayer Chain will be: "For all teachers of the young in Sunday schools, day schools and colleges, that they may see their opportunity and responsibility, and that they may help their pupils to a higher plane of Christian living. That the Spirit of God may abide wherever youth are taught."

A circus reached Colorado Springs one night and the next evening 250 Endeavorers held on the grounds a service attended by about two hundred of those connected with the circus, and at the close thirty of these asked for prayers. On Monday the Endeavorers bought all the Testaments they could secure and gave them to the men. One of the men said that never but once before in his experience had Christian people showed any interest in them, and the manager said that if he had known of the service in advance he would have lighted up his large tent and given its use.

An advance step in the direction of systematic Bible study was taken at the Michigan convention, which adopted unanimously recommendations on the subject made by a special committee. These recommendations call for the appointment of a State superintendent of Bible study, with an advisory board of five leading pastors. Their duty is to promote the study of the Bible in all wise ways, including providing for addresses at conventions, encouraging the holding of Bible institutes, issuing circular letters, recommending literature, and, if it seems advisable, some particular course of study to be carried on under the auspices of the State union. The year for work is to begin Oct. 1, and no society is expected to organize for study without securing the pastor's approval of the course proposed.

THE CONGREGATIONALIST

Boston Thursday 4 June 1896

PILGRIMS

MEMORIES of men of long ago, on the Old Barbican make your round,
Come from your unhorizoned home and welcome your children to Plymouth Sound!
For who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows fly,
After them blowing the wild west wind, over them springing the western sky?

After them curling the long green wave, over them blowing the salt sea spray,
O Pilgrims who sailed off into the gale, Pilgrims adventure back today,
Bringing the fruit of all your faith, bringing the answer to all your prayers,
For your primal hope and your conquering dream, finished, invincible, crowned, is theirs!

Now on this pleasanter pilgrimage than of scallop-shell and staff and shoon,
Roving the Vale of Avilion, blossomy, bowery, green with June,
With them, great Memories, haply tread the dust of Arthur, your ancient peer,

Go with them where a Pilgrim made his earlier progress o'er hill and dale,
And tell them the awful scope and sweep of the dream that was dreamed in Bedford Jail,
Till the far Celestial City's shine into the dusky prison fell,
And all the Delectable Country's air blew its breath through the narrow cell.

Where Chaucer his pilgrims led before, lead your children, great spirits, now!
Man of the people who curbed a king, Becket shall smooth his angry brow,
From his heaven of poesy and song, Milton shall stoop in mighty gyre,
And the men shall come to companion you whose souls for their faith went up in fire.

Down shadowy length of cloistered aisles, dim with a glory of blazoned dyes,
Where vast processional pillars lift the vaulted roof into undershies,
Where the tide of music falls away from fretted stone and from sculpture fair,
Show them the splendor you thought less worth than the blessed freedom of simple prayer!

And turn, when the English twilight falls like a blessing given at day's surcease,
With the singing sway of ancestral boughs and the passing fragrance of dewy peace,
And tell them with what heart-breaking love these happy fallows and fields you trod,
And left them, that those who followed you might come close, close to the heart of God!

ESTIMATES OF MEN.

PROF. J. STUART BLACKIE.

I do not think Professor Blackie was a man of extraordinary intellectual size or weight, but he was one around whom there gathered a particular social and moral interest, and there were flashes in him from time to time of what seemed to belong to the divina particula aura.—William E. Gladstone.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE.

As I have seen Dr. Talmage from the pew, I wish to say that I consider him the greatest word painter on any continent of earth. He paints for Jesus Christ. He thinks in pictures; and he who thinks in pictures thinks vividly. He paints with a large brush and with colors that burn and glow, and nations gather round his pictures and feel an uplift and a holy thrill. There is one thing which Dr. Talmage is able to use beyond any man I have ever heard speak, and that is the rhetorical pause. He makes his sermons vivid and impressive with the flash of a golden silence. Having rounded his period and finished his point, he stops until the hush of heaven fills the house and until his audience has felt the nearness of the God of truth and has heard the still small voice of his Spirit. As used by Dr. Talmage in his masterly way, the pauses let a man analyze himself right on the spot. They let him get hold of the fresh vision of duty and deal with it until the vision resolves itself into a stalwart purpose and until the purpose records itself with a point of a diamond upon the inner tablets of one's nature, that tomorrow and the next day it may incarnate itself in a splendid life. I have been night after night in his Sabbath evening audience, and I have been right in the midst of scores of young men and I have seen how they were moved to the very roots of their manhood by his words and by his pauses. I have seen the play of deep emotion on their serious faces. A new man was then and there being formed within them. A man of holiness and of purity, destined under the Spirit of God to conquer and cast out the old man of sin.—Rev. Dr. David Gregg.

THE SUMMER NUMBERS OF ST. NICHOLAS FOR YOUNG FOLKS.

IF your boys and girls are not already taking St. Nicholas, it will be worth while to arrange to have the summer numbers sent to your out-of-town address. They are to be full of vacation features that are interesting and helpful to young folks in many ways.

THE June St. Nicholas, now ready, contains an article by Lieutenant John M. Ellicott, U. S. N., entitled "What the Bugle Tells on a War Ship." On board of a man-of-war, from morning till night, the bugle is calling officers and men to routine duties, and in battle it directs nearly every movement. Most of the notable bugle-calls are given in this article, from reveille to taps, and some of the words which the sailors have fitted to the notes of many of the calls are given too; as, for instance, the following, which is the "mess call" for officers' breakfast:

Soupey, soupey, soup, soup
Without a single bean;
Porkey, porkey, pork, pork
Without a streak of lean;
Coffee, coffee, cof-fee,
The vilest ever see-n.

A DELIGHTFUL story, "The Lost Princess," by Tudor Jenks, begins in this June St. Nicholas, to be concluded in July; and the first one of "The Talks with Boys and Girls about Themselves" is also in the June number. This is a series of practical articles, the first one of which tells of what our bodies are made. Noah Brooks's "Story of Marco Polo" begins in June, and in it the author of "The Boy Emigrants," and many other stories for young people, describes the adventures of the famous Venetian traveler who crossed the unknown countries of Asia six hundred years ago.

THESE are a few of the many things in the June issue. It is a good number to begin with, and if you are not already taking St. Nicholas you cannot do better than to purchase it at 25 cents on a news-stand, or to give your news agent $1.00 and subscribe for the four numbers—June, July, August and September. St. Nicholas is unquestionably the leading magazine for boys and girls in all the world.

HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE

By Prof. GEO. P. FISHER, Yale University. (International Theological Library.) Crown 8vo, $2.50, net.

Prof. FRIEDRICH LOOFS, Halle, Germany:
"I have, as far as I have read in the book till now, observed with astonishment and delight how familiar the author is with German theology, and with what skill he has compressed the vast material into so handy a volume."

Prof. ALBERT NEWMAN, Toronto, Can.:
"I know of no work that, in point of accuracy, comprehensiveness, and intelligibility can be compared with this."

Prof. WILLIAM SANDAY, Oxford:
"It is to me quite a marvel how a book of this kind can be written so accurately to scale. It could only be done by one who had a very complete command of all the periods."

Prof. H. E. JACOBS, Lutheran Theological Seminary, Philadelphia:
"It will undoubtedly take rank as the very best text-book on the subject in the English language. It combines width of scope and thoroughness with simplicity of treatment."

Prof. J. HENRY THAYER, Harvard University, writes:
"Professor Fisher has trained the public to expect the excellences of scholarship, candor, judicial equipoise, and admirable lucidity and elegance of style in whatever comes from his pen. But in the present work he seems to have surpassed himself. It is a charming volume. The justice of this epithet—however unusual in reference to a work on such a topic—will be proven by the reluctance with which whoever begins to read it will lay it down."

Bishop JOHN F. HURST writes:
"A strong and thorough treatment of this important subject. . . . It presents so many new and fresh points and is so thoroughly treated, and brings into view contemporaneous thought, especially the American, that it is a pleasure to read it, and will be an equal pleasure to go back to it again and again."

ONE of the two great calamities of the week was caused (in the phrase of the insurance companies) by the "act of God," and the other by the carelessness of man. We extend our heartfelt sympathy to the great city of St. Louis in its misfortune and especially to the broken homes and hearts on both sides of its river. In the presence of the mighty wind we realize the helplessness of man and the slender cord by which he holds his treasures. We feel the need of a deeper faith than that of a powerful age in cords of steel and piers of granite and huge walls upholding iron-girded roofs. Out of this trouble sympathy has come, and faith and courage will burn high again. The city will repair its losses, but the scars of the storm will be long in healing, and must be borne by brave hearts quietly. The other calamity affords the needed shadow and contrast for the gigantic pride and ostentation of the czar's coronation. Care for the monarch and his titled guests seems to have been omnipresent and successful, but care for the safety of the common people seems to have failed at a critical point, and the bodies of hundreds, crushed and mangled by the feet of their crowding fellows, show that man in his cruel strength is worse than the tempest. To the victims of this calamity, the living who lament their dead, and the nation mourning in the midst of joy, we bring our sympathy.

Anniversary week seems to have been observed in Boston by the Unitarians and Universalists with more than the usual enthusiasm, aided by interludes of the finest weather between the showers. At the Unitarian reception a paper was presented for signatures, "defining the position of the Unitarian churches in regard to the ordination of their clergy, and showing that by custom and right each individual church exercised the power of ordaining its own minister." Apparent in all the gatherings was a general cheerful optimism, largely founded on the influence of Unitarian thought outside their own churches. Dr. Hale said, for example, "It is given to this Unitarian church to be the church of the Holy Spirit—the church of the future." Judging the future by the past, we believe it belongs to those who believe in the divinity of Christ, but we rejoice in the faith and good works of those whose philosophy of life has missed that, to us, essential element. "That the Unitarian faith had not swept the country like wildfire," Dr. Hale also said, "was because it had inherited too many elegancies from the fine old professors and college men who had given the movement its impetus." The record of Unitarianism can hardly be accounted for in this way, we believe, but others also have to face and solve the problem of harnessing culture to the car of progress for the everyday work and experience of the world.

Talk is plenty and much of it futile in regard to what we have called, in our broadside this week, the present ministerial distress. But, while some of us are debating the subject, about the only agency that is coping practically with it is the Congregational Board of Pastoral Supply. If any have been in doubt as to the usefulness of such an institution its second annual report, just rendered, ought to dispel all questionings. We make liberal citations elsewhere. We are especially impressed with the actual service rendered to so many churches and ministers. The board cannot accomplish miracles, but it is managed with exceeding tact. It is coming to be generally respected. It is capable of far greater development. We rejoice that fully one-half of our Massachusetts churches are contributing their share towards its support. It is not in any case a burdensome sum and strong and weak churches will alike be profited.

The Presbyterian General Assembly at Saratoga appears to have been turned into something of a love feast, largely by the postponement of burning and divisive questions. The committee on control of theological seminaries presented a report which was a practical surrender of the case as against the seminaries which have refused to act and was thereupon discharged. The vexed question of the new Presbyterian House in New York was referred to a committee, and the management of the Home Mission Board to another. Only the attitude of the denomination toward the Christian Endeavor Society was determined by a decisive vote in favor of the continuance of the present relations. What the few remaining days of the session may bring we cannot predict, but thus far there is every evidence of a genuine desire for that peace and concord which both the moderators have counseled. But next year's docket will have these postponed and divisive questions to settle, with the addition of at least one heresy trial.

The second Sunday in June, set apart for many years as Children's Day, is observed, we are glad to say, more widely and willingly every year. It is then that the church can imitate the Master by taking the children in its arms to bless them. It can also show its interest in the children of the land. By custom, by advice of the National Council and of many State bodies the offerings of that day are set apart for the Sunday school missionary work of our C. S. S. and P. S. We hardly need re emphasize the importance of this work. It has opened 566 new schools during this last year. It has sustained about 1,100 schools in places where there is no other Christian work, and the rest of its 1,550 schools are in cities and towns large enough to give them ample field. Its receipts have fallen off this last year, largely because attention has been diverted from it to the societies which were heavily in debt. It is certainly its turn now, and by general co-operation, to have these deficiencies made up. We heartily suggest to the pastors and superintendents of Sunday schools that they do not fail to do their share on Children's Day.

An interesting glimpse of popular thought in a far-away age of the church is found in the translation of one of the song tales of the troubadours which is reviewed in our literary department this week. The place is France, the period somewhere in the thirteenth century, the spirit that of the early feudal courts. The hero of the poem is warned not to carry off the lady against his father's will. What would you gain? he is asked, "for to the world's end your soul would always be in hell, and into Paradise you would never enter." "What have I to do in Paradise," the hero answers. "Into Paradise none go except the sort of people I will tell you of. There go those old priests and those lame and crippled ones who all day and all night grovel before altars and in old crypts; and those clothed in old worn cloaks and in old rags; those who are naked and barefoot and full of sores; those who die of hunger and of thirst, and of cold and of miseries. These go to Paradise; with them have I nothing to do; but into hell I wish to go. For into hell go the goodly clerks and the goodly knights who have died in the tourneys and in the great wars; and the good soldier and the true man. With these do I wish to go." When we think of the troubles of our age and the alienation of many souls from the churches, we may at least be thankful that we have come far away from such a view of heaven and hell as this.

To have direct and fresh tidings from Clara Barton is a somewhat unexpected boon, and the great multitude which is eager to learn of the success of the relief expeditions in Armenia will read with delight her communication of page 900. Considering the fact that Miss Barton and her coadjutors arrived in Constantinople as recently as Feb. 15, and considering, too, the necessary delays involved in the negotiation with the government, it speaks much for her energy and tact that goods began to be shipped into the interior by the first of March. Since that date four expeditions have been sent to the front, two consisting of caravans of materials for distribution among towns and villages, and two equipped with medical supplies for places that had been smitten by contagious diseases. Still other parties are making a circuit through three hundred villages and towns in the province of Harpoot, providing the destitute farmers and mechanics with seeds and tools and with lumber for buildings.

It is pleasant to be assured by Miss Barton that the government is not obstructing her work, and in some cases is materially assisting it. She wishes it understood that the Red Cross organization as a society is not appealing for funds, inasmuch as its basal principle is never to ask help but simply to furnish information regarding the destitution and then to let such facts and its own faithful work constitute the appeal. So the vigorous requests of relief committees in America are not to be considered as emanating from the Red Cross, which, as an organization, is not admitted by the Turkish powers, and does not see fit, even in this case of extreme need to depart from its well-established working principles.

OUR DEPARTING PILGRIMS.

We are aware that the special company which is setting sail this week on the Columbia for England and Holland is only one of many groups of travelers who will this summer cross the Atlantic and wander hither and thither in the Old World. But a distinctiveness is given to this Congregationalist Pilgrimage in the special object it has in view, in the composition of the party, and in the degree of interest which the undertaking has aroused in this country and abroad.

The same general thought which led us to project the Oriental Tour in the early months of 1895, the success of which has been widely recognized, prompted the organization of this second party. Believing that kindred tastes and sympathies are the only conditions that make travel with others endurable and profitable, and believing, too, that journeys to certain historic shrines can be made most advantageously in a party carefully made up and wisely directed, we have provided such an opportunity. The response as respects the English Pilgrimage has been no less gratifying than that accorded the Oriental Tour. Indeed the party which sails this week is larger by ten than the company who went to the Holy Land.

The principle of associated travel is being widely recognized. Boston will soon send across the Atlantic representatives of one of its oldest military organizations to gain by their journey and by contact with its London prototype a larger impetus toward patriotism. Every summer sees many larger or smaller companies of persons whose common interest in scholarly or scientific pursuits forms a delightful bond of union as they move about in the Old World together. It has seemed to us but a further extension of this idea to organize a party of our Congregational people whose unifying tie should be a genuine regard for the historic side of their faith. We have not been disappointed in our expectation, for the size of the Pilgrimage but faintly measures the attention which the project has secured, and could all go who have expressed a desire to be numbered among the pilgrims it would take more than one ship of the size of the Columbia to carry them.

We feel confident that the individual members of the party will have occasion many times to realize what special advantages association with it secures. Doors will be opened which do not usually swing inwards to the touch of the tourist; opportunities to become acquainted with the leaders in our own denomination and with prominent ecclesiastics of the Church of England will be frequent and rewarding, while the exchange of friendly greetings and the giving and receiving of courtesies must surely promote a better understanding between hosts and guests and thus cement the ties between England and America. We have not overstated the warmth of anticipation with which our English brethren look forward to the coming of this American delegation, and we are glad to be able to gather such a representative group of our own people and put them in close touch, not merely with the soil and buildings that are sacred in our eyes, but with the men and the forces that are helping to upbuild and regenerate modern England. As we signalized the beginning of our eightieth year of existence as a paper by conducting a party to the Holy Land, so we are fittingly concluding our eightieth birthday celebration by sending forth these pilgrims to England and Holland.

Through letters from the different members of our staff included in the party we shall hear, from week to week, with reference to its doings and its varied delights. Meanwhile we voice the kind feeling and large hopes of all of our readers when we wish the outgoing pilgrims a safe and smooth passage, good fellowship among themselves, invigoration of body and spirit, and on sea and land an ever deepening sense of God's protection and of the beauty and richness of the world which he has created and adorned for his children's use and enjoyment.

THE OWNERSHIP OF JUNE.

Those who are fortunate enough to go upon The Congregationalist's pilgrimage are to be congratulated, but those whose duties keep them at home need not envy them their opportunity. If they have the rest of the blue deep and the green lanes of Merrie England, with its historic memories and friendly greetings, we who stay at home have June; and he who cannot be content with June for a companion in our own country roads and fields has never learned what simple and delightful pleasures God has provided for the open eye and ear.

Early June belongs to the bobolink and the bumblebee, but they have never divided the inheritance and are quite ready to share it with the poet and the child. It is the month of the clover, of cool depths of shadow on broad meadows, where the vesper sparrow's nest is hid in its hollow among the roots, and the bobolink's miracle of concealment is performed again to the amazement of all would-be callers on his quiet wife. The sparrow has doubts and fears, creeps in from a distance and is well away from the nest on his return before he spreads his wings and shows the white quills of his tail; but to the bobolink the success of his brown wife's hiding is so good, so rich, so inexhaustible a joke that he is never tired of telling it. He flies up from the clover quite without concern and turns his somersault in the air and trills his daring song, while his wings shake with bubbling laughter: "It's hid! She's there! Mrs. Lincoln! Meg O'Lincoln! Find her! Find her if you can! Ho! Ho! Ho! What a joke! What a joke!" Then he balances on a grass-stalk, or perches on a bough and lets us see his spring uniform of black and buff, while he sings it all over again in rivalry with another gay husband not far away who thinks his joke is better still. And behind the laughter is that ecstasy of delight in love and hope and fine weather which is of the essence of the time, and carries us beyond laughter almost to the bound of tears.

Nor is there any conflict between the song of the bobolink and the droning note of the bumblebee. If one is ecstasy, the other is a warm content—a kind of purring hum that seems the echo and expression of the growth of grass and clover. The bobolink is practical enough, though at this season he hides his industry under a mask of rollicking laughter and delight, but the bee is the incarnate joy of exploration and accumulation. A new world opens to him with the opening of the crimson clover—a world of nectar of the most intoxicating fragrance, to which he alone holds the key. The brown honeybee who lives with man and works for men has no share in this delight, because with his short tongue he has no means of reaching the intoxicating depths and must extract his nectar from the shorter tubed white clover of the lawns and roadsides, but the bumblebee seems made for the clover as the clover for the bumblebee, and the fragrance and the humming song belong together, recalling the beauty of June days, with fresh blue sky and moving clouds, the throb of heat above the roadside, and the hillside meadow stretching bright with clover and moon daisies to the green wall of the forest far away.

Little children know the time and are nearer to the lengthening grasses than their elders. To them every new flower is a treasure, and because they have not lost the simple joy of faith all things seem made for their possession. A handful of nodding daisies is not enough, both hands must be as full as they can hold, and when these gatherings have been given to the mother's keeping, where she sits in the shadow of a great tree by the meadow's edge, the wee toddler hurries back for fresh treasures.

Happy is he who goes out to the world of June with the child's spirit, believing that God has made all these good and beautiful things for his enjoyment, and yet intent to share them at the first opportunity with others for love's sake. For it is the presence of love with the child, as with the bobolink, which gives its hidden, but essential, charm to the beauty of the time. Were the child alone his overflowing happiness would change to terror for sheer loneliness, but the consciousness that the mother's love or the companion's help is near makes him free to enjoy the full beauty of the flowers and grass and sky.

And in this childlike spirit we too, upon whose spirits the shadows of experience rest, must come if we are to possess our inheritance in the beauty of the world. "All things are for your sakes," but only when the deepest consciousness is that of the underlying care and love of the Maker of them all. The beauty of the lilies and the joy of the birds was most real to Jesus, because to him alone of his whole generation the thought of God's presence was the ever present, never questioned, source of peace. This thought, this gift of an abiding, child-like faith, he shares with us and for us, as really as for the little child among the flowers; and it is the confidence in his providing and foreseeing love which makes the subtlest underlying charm of the most perfect day of June.

THE CALL OF THE MINISTER.

The leveling up of the congregation has brought an apparent leveling down of the ministry, which, however, we are glad to know is rather apparent than real. The old attitude of intellectual superiority which stooped to share its gathered knowledge is gone forever, but honor for leadership, intellectual, moral, social, is ungrudgingly given now as of old to those who deserve it, and the opportunity of service and of self-denial for the sake of service is larger than ever before.

Suppose that we accept the worst that has been or can be said of the hardships of the ministry today, agreeing for the sake of the argument that the temptations of ease and social standing and unquestioned authority are not what they were a generation ago; that young men are in demand and old men cast aside, that the laity are impatient of control and critical of knowledge, that outsiders come in and take the place of the children of the denomination, that salaries are lessening and places hard to find—none of these things touch the essential point, though some of them illustrate it.

The ministry as a commercial speculation, or as a step of social preferment, or even as a means of livelihood is failing, let us for the argument admit; but the ministry as the prophet's call, the voice that cries for God regardless of consequences and trusting God for results, has the same opportunity before it that it has always had, and better, because the presence of God was never more manifest or more desired in the earth than it is today.

One of our correspondents asks what answer he is to give to two young men who seem devoted to God's service and ready to work. Approached from the commercial side—the side of ease and money—the prospect is discouraging, but approached from the side of opportunity, with will to go anywhere, do anything, suffer loss, hunger, sorrow, loneliness, if only Christ may be preached and souls helped upward, there should be no question of the need and duty.

This is the test, the only and sufficient test, of the minister's call. He gives up everything, accepting what God may send as a pilgrim's provision from day to day, and thankful that it is enough to hold him up in his chosen work. And for him who is thus consecrated there will always be work first and bread afterward.

The first step toward a larger giving, we believe, will be in the recognition of a higher ideal of prophetic self-devotion. Laymen will not count their gifts with niggardly care when they see that their spiritual leaders give their lives in unstinted self-devotion.

In what we have just said we have left untouched most of the questions of immediate and practical importance suggested by our correspondents in an attempt to reach what seems to us the true heart of the matter. It is a revival of a higher ideal of the minister's call and work which is needed both for candidates and congregations. We commend our correspondents' letters, printed on pages 889, 890, to careful reading and the questions they raise to prayerful thought, and we shall recur to some of the problems of administration which they suggest.

THE HOUSE BEAUTIFUL THAT IS TO BE.

All the pride and anticipation which a family naturally cherishes in the prospect of a new, more commodious and more beautiful home may properly be entertained by the great Congregational family of the United States in the certain promise of a new building in Boston. We need it, and it may properly be claimed that our standing in the country constitutes sufficient reason why we should have it, and as a family imbued with the right spirit looks forward to the occupancy of a new abode, not merely for selfish enjoyment, but as a center for wider influence, so a serious as well as a joyous sense of larger duty should already take possession of our hearts.

Equipped with the structure, which is soon to be a reality, the denomination will be in a position to carry on its various activities more effectively. A tangible, concrete embodiment of the denominational spirit in substantial walls and appropriate adornments will have its proper effect upon our growing youth, our visitors from foreign shores and the public generally. Gratifying indeed is it that after so long a halt in the proceedings, and after the encountering of so many obstacles there has been so sudden and satisfactory a turn of affairs. So happy an outcome takes on the character of a special providence, for which there should be deep and general thanksgiving. Yet recognition of the divine hand should not blind us to the fact that potent human instrumentalities were at work, and if there is one man to whom the denomination owes its gratitude for that which has been brought about his name is Samuel B. Capen—a name immediately suggesting unsparing devotion to the denomination and to the general weal.

It may not be too early to express the hope that the hall in the new structure may have a distinctively memorial character and that its furnishings and decorations shall fittingly commemorate the deeds and characters of those whom we, as a denomination, will always hold in high honor. It would not be difficult, we are sure, to provide, in one way or another, special windows, wall decorations, tablets and other devices which would, in time, make the hall a shrine for American Congregationalism both in its historic and artistic characteristics. We shall have more to say in regard to this point at the suitable time.

TEMPERANCE IN ALL THINGS.

Temperance is not necessarily the same as abstinence. It means primarily limited, controlled, regulated indulgence. Temperance in eating, for example, does not mean going without food, but avoiding harmful eatables and taking only so much of any food as is necessary and proper for health and comfort. It is the opposite of gluttony but it does not involve going hungry. We all understand this in regard to most subjects, but in connection with the use of wines or liquors temperance has come to be identified with abstinence more often than otherwise.

This probably is true because for so many the least indulgence is full of evil, so that for them temperance cannot stop short of actual abstinence, and because so many others, aware of the power of example, nobly prefer to deny themselves in a degree rather than risk leading the weak into temptation. For them, too, temperance has come to signify abstinence.

Whatever differences of opinion may exist upon the matter among good men, it is certain that our freedom is limited in a considerable degree by the possibility that to claim our full rights may be misunderstood and may injure some one else. This we are to avoid scrupulously. At the same time, the strong has his rights as truly as the weak, and it is a fair question if the discriminating and successful exercise of them may not sometimes afford the weak brother himself a better example than uniform concession to his weakness. There is such a thing as making him weaker by always treating him as too weak to be trusted.

Nevertheless, self-sacrifice rather than self-indulgence must be our rule, and it should be accepted cheerfully. Temperance, even when in itself disagreeable, is rich in blessing. It promotes health, prosperity and sturdiness of character. It wins human respect and honor, and it gains the divine approval.

CURRENT HISTORY.

The Prohibition Party's National Convention.

The convention of the Prohibition party, held in Pittsburg, Pa., last week, from start to finish was one full of dissension and most significant in its outcome. Every step in the proceedings, from the selection of a temporary chairman to the adoption of a platform, was bitterly contested between the "narrow gauge," "dominant issue" faction and the "broad gauge" faction, and when the former triumphed in the formulation of the platform and the selection of candidates, 175 of the "broad gauge" faction, including ex-Governor St. John and Mrs. Helen Gougar, bolted the convention and at 4 A. M. created a new party—the National—with a broad gauge platform. The candidates of the regulars are, for president, Joshua W. Levering of Baltimore, and for vice-president Hale Johnson of Illinois. Mr. Levering was nominated by acclamation. He is a well-to-do, reputable Baltimore merchant and active Baptist layman. The bolters—the National party—named for president Rev. Charles E. Bentley of Nebraska, a Baptist clergyman, and for vice-president J. H. Southgate of North Carolina. The regulars' platform is one that was substituted for an elaborate one recommended by the committee on platform, after a long strife in committee session. It abstains from all reference to the many problems of State, which State Prohibition conventions during the past few years have been so wont to be dogmatic about, and pledges the party to a contest to be fought on one issue, viz., prohibition of the traffic in intoxicants. The platform of the bolters, the National party, makes prohibition the first of three planks, woman's suffrage being the second, and the free coinage of silver at a ratio of sixteen to one the third. Mr. Levering's character as a man, and the platform on which he stands will retain in and win back to the party many who have become disgusted with its latter-day vagaries; while the "bolters" will soon find their appropriate consorts in those, South and West, who stand ready to bolt from the Democratic and Republican parties if they do not declare in favor of the free coinage of silver. The outcome of the convention in Pittsburg is gratifying. It is a triumph of conservatism, a sign that sanity has not given place to delusion; and the separation, or sloughing off process which it has caused will hasten the return of national health, as well as preserve the Prohibition party's life. As the foe of a licensed liquor traffic it has won the respect of all who admire positiveness of conviction and pertinacity of purpose, but as the ally of socialists, inflationists and repudiationists it would soon have perished utterly.

Cyclonic Ravages.

For some reason, as yet unaccounted for even by our ablest meteorologists, the past six weeks have been peculiarly full of disaster, owing to the ravages of cyclones in the Interior, West and Southwest. Naught that man has failed to do can be cited as the cause of this extraordinary chastisement, and naught that he can do, in the way of creation of physical barriers, seems to promise any protection for the future. Hitherto cyclones have smitten prairie hamlets, villages and now and then thrifty towns, but last week, on the 27th, a conjunction of winds over St. Louis, Mo., and East St. Louis, Ill., made the inhabitants of that typical urban center realize that a mid continental metropolis is as insignificant as a prairie village in the grip of one of nature's cataclysms. Public buildings, churches, large manufactories, steamboats, the massive Eads bridge across the Mississippi, as well as about 3,000 residences, were demolished, in whole or in part, as if they had been jackstraws in the hands of a sturdy and angry youth. Fire added its horrors to the scene, and ghouls in human form instantly began to pillage. The number of the dead is variously estimated, but certainly not less than 350 were killed and 400 injured seriously. The loss of property was not less than $5,000,000, perhaps $20,000,000, and most of it, sad to say, unrecoverable from insurance companies, owing to the peculiar cause of the disaster. St. Louis is nobly caring for its own, and the country has not been asked to send aid, as at the time of the Johnstown disaster.

President Cleveland's Veto.

In vetoing the River and Harbor Appropriation Bill President Cleveland has relieved himself of all responsibility for a course of extravagance at a time when the nation needs to practice thrift and exercise prudence. Wherever the responsibility may rest for the condition of our national finances, whether on Mr. Cleveland, or Congress, or the people who put him and it in power, the fact remains that the present is no time for such reckless legislation, such present and prospective expenditure of money, as this River and Harbor Bill and other bills now before Congress call for. The man in debt, who at one and the same time refused to add to his income and was most eager to incur new obligations, would be termed foolish or wicked. Words no less strong apply exactly to the members of Congress, who, like Senator Sherman of Ohio last week, when given an opportunity to join in a sensible method of adding to the national revenue, one which would be effective and in consonance with the methods of other nations, one which would not conflict with any party's political creed, neglected to seize it, refused to consider the question in a non-partisan, statesmanlike way, because, forsooth, it serves their party's interests to accentuate the disparity between national income and legitimate national outgo. President Cleveland is exactly right when he says:

> Individual economy and careful expenditure are sterling virtues which lead to thrift and comfort. Economy and the exaction of clear justification for the appropriation of public moneys by the servants of the people are not only virtues but solemn obligations.
> To the extent that the appropriations contained in this bill are instigated by private interests and promote local or individual projects, their allowance cannot fail to stimulate a vicious paternalism and encourage a sentiment among our people, already too prevalent, that their attachment to our Government may properly rest upon the hope and expectation of direct and especial favors and that the extent to which they are realized may furnish an estimate of the value of governmental care.
> I believe no greater danger confronts us as a nation than the unhappy decadence among our people of genuine and trustworthy love and affection for our Government as the embodiment of the highest and best aspirations of humanity, and not as the giver of gifts, and because its mission is the enforcement of exact justice and equality and not the allowance of unfair favoritism.

A renaissance of self-respect, self-support, individualism is what is needed in this country more than anything else. Class legislation and appropriations for individuals, communities and trades entirely competent to stand alone are breeding appetites for which "pap" is the only appropriate food. Men who volunteered to save the nation are now coming to think of the Civil War as a purely business transaction, and they are clamoring for their wages. Hence the service pension bill now before Congress. Our Supreme Court has just sustained Congress in beginning a bounty system to producers of sugar, and the owners of silver mines in the West are perfectly logical in their demand for equally favorable legislation.

Judicial Decisions.

The decision of the Federal Supreme Court in the Horsa case, finding the captain of that vessel guilty of violation of the neutrality laws, in his recent attempt to serve the Cuban rebels by transporting men and arms to Cuba, sustains every point made by the Attorney General in his instructions to Federal officials, and will go far toward making it more difficult for the Cuban revolutionists to procure ammunition and other supplies from this country. The same court, in its decision on the sugar bounty test case, reverses the decision of Comptroller Bowler, and orders him to cease standing in the way of executing the law passed by the last Congress. The court abstains from discussing the question of the validity of bounty legislation, and reaffirms the position that "in general an unconstitutional act of Congress is the same as if there were no act," but it holds, nevertheless, that in equity there is a moral and honorable claim upon the United States for bounties promised to sugar producers, whether the legislation of 1890 establishing the sugar bounty system was constitutional or not. Had the court decided upon the question of the validity of bounty legislation, it would have been a most important decision, for the question then adjudicated upon would really have been whether or not the Federal Government is to persevere in a course of industrial paternalism.

The decision of the highest court in New York State that the Raines Tax Bill, abolishing excise boards and creating a system of State control of the traffic in intoxicants, is constitutional insures a thorough test of the merit or demerit of that radical and much abused new law. Thus far the revenue accruing to the State has been much less than was anticipated.

The Autocrat of Russia.

Nicolas II., self-crowned, sits enthroned "emperor of all the Russias." Nothing that applied science, unlimited expenditure of money and elaborate customs—barbaric but splendid—could do to aid in making a gorgeous pageant has been omitted from the coronation celebration, which in Moscow has lasted nearly two weeks, and will be continued when the royal party returns to St. Petersburg. Occidential and Oriental potentates have vied with each other in the lavishness of their expenditure for the fancied proper conduct of their representatives in Moscow. France, the European republic, thankful for past favors from Russia and yearning for more, has poured forth money so recklessly as to make herself a laughing-stock among those whose favor she has courted. Our representatives, with becoming simplicity and dignity, have creditably represented us, and not failed to receive marked tokens of the czar's respect.

The proclamation from the czar granting amnesty to certain offenders and remitting taxation to certain favored classes is exceedingly disappointing to those who hoped for some indication of the dawning of a new era in Russia. Capital punishment in its worst form it was thought might be abolished. Religious toleration, amnesty to political offenders, a lessening of the Siberian horrors, a measure of representative government—all these had been prayed for by not a few intelligent, patriotic Russians. Either the czar is not willing to go so far, or, if willing, he has been overborne by those around his throne, who live either to further their own interests or those of the Greek Church and the higher classes. Nicolas II. had an opportunity such as comes to few men in the course of time. He has failed to seize it, and from now on a renewal of the revolutionary methods which made his father's life miserable may make his lot equally unenviable. A truly great soul, after the awful catastrophe on the Hodynsky Plain, May 3, in which more than 1,100 persons were trampled to death in a wild stampede of the multitude seeking for food and drink and the other tokens of the royal bounty, would have put an end to feasting and gayety as well as devoted himself to succoring his people.

The Revolt in Crete.

The revolt against Turkish rule in Crete has assumed such proportions as to renew discussion of the future of the island, suggest the possible partition of Turkey—Crete being assigned to Greece—and a reopening of the Eastern question, with Crete rather than Armenia as the storm center.

Forcible expressions of opinion have been put forth by representative American ecclesiastical assemblies relative to the duty of our Government in defending the missionaries in Turkey. The Presbyterian General Assembly last week said:

> We cordially and gratefully recognize the sincere efforts of the President of the United States to secure the safety of our missionaries in the Turkish empire, and tender to him our support in every effort he may make to secure this indispensable object. We pledge ourselves and the church we represent to give our prayers and our whole influence in every relation to secure an object so sacred and to discharge an obligation to this people bound to us by bands that cannot be dissolved. We hail with joy the dawn of that better day when liberty of conscience shall not only be the conceded right of all men everywhere, but shall be a recognized rule in the law of nations to be enforced as such. We believe it to be the duty of our Government to assert and enforce all treaty rights in behalf of American citizens, and we pledge ourselves and those we represent to give it our hearty and patriotic support.

And the Methodist Episcopal General Conference went even further and said:

Whereas, An exceedingly great and bitter cry has gone up from Armenia, devastated, pillaged and trampled under the iron heel of armed persecutors, in which hundreds of our fellow-Christians have been murdered in cold blood, or, surviving, suffered nameless outrages; be it

Resolved, That the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, assembled in Cleveland in May, 1896, does hereby petition Congress to pass a joint resolution at the earliest possible date, authorizing the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with the European Powers most directly interested, with the view and to the end that such Powers or Governments be requested, in the name of humanity and civilization, to take such action as will forever put a stop to these atrocious and shameful outrages.

NOTES.

Miss Kate Field, who died May 19 in Honolulu, and "Brick" Pomeroy, who died last week, were clever rather than great wielders of the pen.

A new era of municipal health dawned in New York city last week, when the Board of Health, acting under the stringent and wholesome law of 1895, condemned fifteen of its worst "rear" tenement houses in the city and ordered them vacated and destroyed.

The best elements of society in Boston during the past week have been ably represented at hearings before the police commissioners, and indignant protests have been filed against further multiplication of saloons in the Dorchester district, and against the establishment of municipal saloons in the city parks.

The Parliament of Cape Colony has made known to the British Foreign Office its desire for a thorough investigation of Sir Cecil Rhodes's conduct and its distrust of him. The release of all the members of the Johannesburg Reform Committee, save the four ringleaders originally condemned to death, is appreciated by the Uitlanders, and will strengthen the moral position of President Kruger and the Transvaal republic.

Louisiana's new senator is a free coinage of silver adherent. The Democratic primaries held in Kentucky last week make it certain that Secretary of the Treasury Carlisle will suffer the chagrin of seeing his State delegation join the free coinage of silver faction at the Chicago convention, and it is generally conceded now that Ohio and Indiana will do likewise. The Vermont Democratic State Convention last week indorsed the gold standard and the candidacy of ex-Governor Russell of Massachusetts. The revolt against Mr. Platt by New York Republicans progresses under the lead of the New York Tribune and Hon. Warner Miller.

IN BRIEF.

To Anxious Inquirer: Your postal card is at hand. No, the elevator in the present Congregational House will not be transferred to the new structure.

Now the summer supply committee wrinkles its brow over the problem of parceling out four or six available Sundays among four or six times that number of applicants.

"The whole tendency of the gospel is to abase man and to exalt God."—New York Observer. The whole tendency of the gospel is to redeem man and thus to glorify God.

At a recent association meeting one pastor said that the past year had brought him "the heaviest burdens and the sweetest blessings" he had ever known. How often in the Christian life the two go hand in hand.

The fact that Rev. Dr. D. S. Clark was one of our Oriental tourists makes it particularly appropriate that in this issue he should proffer some sage council to the pilgrims now headed toward England and Holland.

A writer in the Windsor Magazine says very pointedly and happily, "An optimist is a man who is happy when he's miserable, and a pessimist is a man who is miserable when he is happy." The definition may not be exhaustive, but it is extremely suggestive.

The Pilgrim Church, St. Louis, raised $1,000 last Sunday for the unfortunate victims of the cyclone. That looks as if the level of splendid giving to which Drs. Goodell and Stimson lifted their willing people was being preserved under Dr. Burnham's administration.

Here comes another fund whose object in life is to wipe out a missionary society debt. Our A. M. A. brethren have started well, as the record on page 911 shows. We shall all take pleasure in seeing the list grow, and happiest of all will those be who can help make it grow.

It is a singular and suggestive fact that in this country of magnificent distances and innumerable towns both the new Methodist bishops should be natives of one small Ohio town. The presence of Ohio University probably explains, not the birth, but the direction of their talents and is another testimony to the formative power of an institution of learning with the youth of the town where it is located.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Cook have been at Cliff Seat, Ticonderoga, their summer home, since the first of May. It is hoped that with the aid of the tonic mountain air, and in the midst of the familiar scenes of his boyhood, Mr. Cook will complete the rest cure begun at Clifton Springs, and that the autumn will find him on the highroad to health. The large circle of friends who await eagerly tidings from Mr. Cook's sickroom will join with all their hearts in this hope and anticipation of his physicians and of members of his own family.

Informal overtures from a committee of Union Church, Boston, were presented to Shawmut Church at a meeting on Friday evening, and a committee of conference was appointed. In view of the quite prevalent opinion that such a union would strengthen Congregationalism at the South End, it is well that a joining of forces should be considered, though neither church lacks opportunity or is in distress, and neither stands committed to any further action by this friendly conference of committees. The confidence in Dr. Barton shown by the Union Church overture must be very gratifying to him, as it is to his people.

Prof. Henry Drummond, so the latest and most authoritative tidings assure us, is slowly pulling up the hill toward complete recovery. He is still at Tunbridge Wells in the south of England, where, of course, he is the recipient of the best of care, though there are far too few ways and opportunities for the devotion of his host of friends to find tangible expression. His has been a long and painful illness, but his faith and hope have stood the test. Few men in health have done more to illuminate doubters and to confirm the faint-hearted. Now on his sickbed he is still a powerful witness to the reality of religion, and we doubt not that he is surer than ever today that love is the greatest thing in the world.

Again have clergymen asserted their authority as law-abiding and law-conserving citizens. To the ministers of Long Island City, N. Y., must be given the credit of compelling such action by the mayor of that city and the sheriff and district attorney of Queen's County as prevented a prize-fight, widely advertised, which the "sports" of New York city and Brooklyn were planning to witness on the eve of Decoration Day. The clergymen even went to Albany and summened to their aid Governor Morton, who gladly issued an admonition to the sheriff of Queen's County to attend to his sworn duty, and pledging him the aid of the State if he met with resistance. The fight at Woburn, near Boston, last Friday evening was a most brutal affair, and inexplicable unless local officials were in league with the "sports."

It was fitting, indeed, that Dr. Webb should have preached the sermon at the installation of Rev. Nehemiah Boynton, D. D., over the First Church at Detroit last week. He it was who offered the ordaining prayer when the young theologue, fresh from Andover and then a plain Mister, was inducted into his first charge at Littleton, Mass. Again, when the transition came to Haverhill, Dr. Webb was on hand to preach the installation sermon; and still again, when Union Church, Boston, wooed and won Dr. Boynton, did his father in the faith perform the same function. He also officiated at his marriage and baptized his children. This is the kind of transmission of ecclesiastical grace from one minister to another to which no one can take exception, and we can easily understand how the solemn and tender way in which Dr. Webb has performed the duties intrusted to him has left its permanent impression upon the younger man.

Dr. Webb, by the way, flits about in obedience to summons from here and there with an agility that will not be surpassed by the new Methodist bishops, who have their reputations to make. From Detroit he came East to New Haven, where he is to preside at some of the services of the home missionary meeting this week. Another of his immediate engagements is at the Vermont State Convention. He has been supplying recently for the Union Church at Worcester, and as chairman of the Prudential Committee of the American Board many of his week days are as fully occupied as his Sundays. Certainly, since Dr. Webb resigned ten years ago the pastorate of Shawmut Church at the expiration of a quarter of a century of exceptionally fruitful service there, he has done enough faithful and successful work in various lines to shame the idler in any profession, and most of all the ministerial loafer.

Ex-President Fairchild of Oberlin writes us correcting a statement in our columns last week intimating that President Finney was loath to resign the reins of government at Oberlin. Says Dr. Fairchild: "I was never on a committee to suggest to Mr. Finney his resignation of the presidency of the college, and I am sure that no such committee was ever appointed. At the earnest solicitation of trustees and faculty, he reluctantly accepted the position in 1851 with the understanding that he should be relieved from many duties of administration. He regarded his weekly preaching as the most important service he could render. It was always understood that he was ready to retire whenever a successor could be appointed. Such an appointment was made in 1866, and Mr. Finney had a voice with others in bringing it about. I have some apprehension that he wished we had a better man for the place, but there was no evidence of any hesitation on his own account." The point of Dr. Fairchild's naïve allusion in the last sentence which we have quoted will be missed by those who do not know that Finney's mantle fell on Fairchild himself, and if any "better" man could have been found he would have been altogether too celestial in his make-up for association with common mortals, particularly college students. This country has produced but few college presidents who have been the peer of Dr. Fairchild.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM NEW YORK.

A Sad Disappointment.

The "shame of every high-minded citizen" in view of the condition of our public schools was not overstated in The Congregationalist's paragraph of Current History last week. Not that the majority of our teachers are incompetent—many of them are singularly well-qualified and devoted; not that the buildings are lacking in adaptedness to their uses, in sanitary conditions, in apparatus, in attractiveness—many of them are "up to the times" in these regards. But so used has the city become to boss rule, to omnipresent Tammany greed and despotism, that it has long seemed, even to the best friends of our schools, impossible to have them conducted with an eye to the welfare of the children and the honor of the city, rather than to the enriching of low-lived politicians with the spoils from building and repairing schoolhouses, buying furniture, books, apparatus, etc., with blackmail extorted from candidates for positions, usurious interest from the cashing of teachers' checks, and the many dark ways and vain tricks whereby a politician for revenue only knows how to line his pockets.

Yet those best friends persevered and a grand success was theirs when the legislature opened the way to change all that, and when Dr. Gilman of Johns Hopkins, the best men in the country for the work, encouraged them to hope he would undertake the needed revolution their cup of joy was full. Very chilling to hope here was the action of the college, so complimentary to its president, but the friends rallied when told that he might come, after all, and correspondingly heavy was the blow when, on Wednesday afternoon, he found himself obliged to put a final veto on his further consideration of the matter. The board met on Thursday, voted down the nomination of Mr. C. B. Gilbert, superintendent of schools in St. Paul, Minn., refused to defer the election to give time for presenting another candidate, and re-elected the present incumbent, so perpetuating for six years more the present state of things.

Our Congregational Club.

The closing meeting of the season was exceedingly pleasant, as a talk from Mr. Mabie on a literary theme will make any meeting, particularly when he talks on Tennyson and two well-qualified ladies supplement the discourse with songs and recitations from the laureate's works. The executive committee's report showed a full membership with a large average attendance, and the treasury in its usual state of prosperity, with some $2,700 on hand for beginning the next season. John H. Washburn, Esq., of the Broadway Tabernacle Church was elected president, Drs. Bradford and Clapp as vice-presidents, Ernest Greene as secretary; Charles E. Hope as treasurer was continued in office. Three new members of the executive committee were chosen: Dr. H. C. Houghton, Albert Shaw, Ph. D., of the Review of Reviews, and Mr. Randall Spaulding of Montclair. The new chairman of the membership committee is Dr. R. T. Hall of Greenwich, Ct.

The Pratt Free Library.

The new library building of Brooklyn's Pratt Institute was dedicated on Tuesday. It has cost $190,000 and will require an outlay of $135,000 yearly to maintain it. Mr. Charles M. Pratt, president of the trustees and the son of the donor, made the principal address and was followed by Mrs. Margaret Deland of Boston on The Importance and Right Use of a Public Library, Truman J. Backus on The Influence of Books and Melville Dewey, State librarian, on The Educational Advantages of the Public Library and Its Relations to the Schools. The structure has been carefully planned after the latest and most approved models. A large reading-room, with hundreds of papers and magazines in several languages, a children's reading-room, with appropriate books and helps in their selection, a large collection of books of reference, many works on art and a school for training competent librarians are among the leading features of the library.

Hard Blow at Rapid Transit.

It is certainly not easy to get about the city or out of it with the present facilities. The elevated cars are crowded to suffocation at the hours when most people want to use them. Horse cars are rapidly giving way to those drawn by cables, rapid enough when they don't get snarled, but jerky, wrenching, and filling passengers with a constant sense of danger. So people were glad when, after years of backing and filling, the underground road seemed to be in full sight, with certain rapid "through trains" to anywhere. Then the Court of Appeals said, "No, it can't be done legally," and the whole plan went up, at least for the present. Now, the rich "elevated" folks are studying how to take the greatest advantage of the situation, and are talking of multiplying their roads, making their cars partly comfortable, after a poor, lame, perspiring citizen climbs up to them. If they are really seeking to catch the public, why don't they supply every station with an elevator or two? And why not stop taking in more than can either sit or stand in their cars.

We Have "Processions," Too.

One of them paraded last Tuesday, the like of which was never seen in Boston nor any other city in the world. It was Colonel Waring's white-duck-clad army of street sweepers, or, as the irreverent call them, "Waring's white-winged angels." (On wet days they don oil-cloth raiment, and then they are called the colonel's "canary birds.") One thing is certain, no angels or canary birds ever before kept so clean the streets of New York, and the colonel is shrewdly managing to make them proud of their work and keep them from letting down the standard of excellence to which he has brought them. Over 2,200 of the clean, white uniformed sweepers with 750 horses and vehicles were in the procession, headed by mounted police and enlivened by seven regimental bands and a drum corps. Several platform trucks with girls and others with boys of the Children's Auxiliary Aid Societies, who help the sweepers keep things tidy, added to the liveliness of the procession. Other platforms were filled with the implements of the corps. The colonel has awarded prizes for the best appearance on the parade, the best teams, the best kept stables, etc. In such ways this shrewd man will keep his men up to the mark until he fully demonstrates that a great city can be kept clean when that, and not the depleting of its treasury for buying the votes of loafers, is the aim.

In Honor of the Czar.

The cosmopolitan make-up of our city is seldom made so apparent as it was on Tuesday in the little Greek Church of St. Nicholas on Second Avenue, where services in several languages and before people of many lands besides the Russians were held in honor of the czar's coronation. Mass was celebrated in Greek. Prayers were offered in several tongues—the old Slavonic being prominent—and one for the President of the United States was in English. Solemn chants were sung. The Russian consulate was closed and the consul-general, his assistant, with many consuls from England, France, Spain, Greece, Turkey and China, were present in their showy uniforms, with a few Americans, who, perhaps, learned something from hearing the warm expressions of affectionate loyalty from the subjects of that distant monarch, not commonly supposed to be regarded with very tender emotions by his subjects either at home or abroad, especially in Siberia.

HUNTINGTON.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Dismissal of Rev. W. A. Bartlett.

To the regret of all who know him, Mr. Bartlett is clear in his convictions that he ought to accept the call of the Kirk Street Church, Lowell. In accordance with his decision a large and representative council met May 25 at the Ridgeland Church, which he has served for seven years, to bid him Godspeed. He leaves a united and strong church, which, under his ministry, has grown from about sixty to two hundred and sixty members. The testimony given to his fidelity and success in his work, to his usefulness as a lecturer on music in the seminary, to his qualities as a man among men, was such as is granted few men to receive. The council as well as the church expressed their appreciation of what Mrs. Bartlett has done in seconding the efforts of her husband. We congratulate the Kirk Street Church on the wise choice it has made and can only wish for our brother and his wife as useful and as happy a pastorate East as they have had in the Interior.

Chicago and the Larger Congregationalism.

Notwithstanding the rapid growth in the number of our churches during the last decade many have felt that steps ought to be taken to secure a unity of action among Congregationalists which will show itself hereafter in a wiser location of churches and in a distribution of forces which will not leave the center and the poorer sections of the city uncared for. The drift is away from the older and stronger churches and, unless something is done to check it, these churches will, before many years have passed, be unable to contribute large sums to purely mission work in the slums and, at the same time, take the lead in the establishment of new churches. The feeling is prevalent that promising locations must be secured in the newer portions of the city and its suburbs for churches which ere long will become contributing churches and able to relieve the few churches which up to this time have borne the burden of aggressive work. That matters concerning the welfare of the denomination, its responsibilities to the people in and about the city and the best means to advance its growth and use its resources might be intelligently considered, eighty gentlemen met at the Leland Hotel Monday evening, at the invitation of the City Missionary Society, to express their views upon the problem of church extension. There is no purpose on the part of any one to trench on the territory of other denominations. Reference during the discussion was made to the sums which the Clark Street M. E. Church, during the last ten years, has been able to give in aid of church erection, perhaps an average of $30,000 annually, and to the prospects which some other denominations have of soon having large means at their disposal for similar purposes. Our speakers recognized the fact that for our expenditure of about $25,000 a year we must depend upon regular gifts from the churches, that we cannot expect to place very large sums of money at the disposal of any body of Christian people bearing our name desiring to erect a house of worship. Emphasis was put on the need of a place in the center of the city where a man with gifts like those of Dr. Gunsaulus may reach the masses with the gospel, as well as of mission churches and mission schools in portions of the city where, but for these institutions, thousands of people will have no religious privileges whatever.

As an illustration of the need in what may be called the new city, in which there are at present no churches at all, the Washington Park Church, where Professor Mackenzie has been preaching, was mentioned. In a region nearly a mile square, which is rapidly filling up with the best class of people, there is only this evangelical church. Professor Curtiss's report was received as a matter over which to rejoice, that Mr. Sidney Kent had offered a lot to this new organization worth at least $30,000 for a trifle more than half that amount, and that arrangements had been made by the City Missionary Society to take it. The location thus obtained, Garfield Boulevard and Indiana Avenue, is one of the best on the South Side, and, with a part of the building ready for use next fall, a rapid growth for the church is certain. The society was asked to appoint a committee of business men to consider this complicated question of church extension and place itself in communication with the officers of the society, the fields to be occupied and the contributing churches. Appreciative words were uttered by nearly all the speakers of what the society has already accomplished. But it has become evident to all that we are now in a period of transition, that our forces must be carefully organized and wisely directed, that foundations must be laid for a service in the future which the growth of the city calls for and the interests of the denomination throughout the country demand. Unless we have strong churches in the suburbs, and in what now seem to be the fringes of the city, we cannot continue to make large contributions to our national societies. Hence the movement, from which good results are anticipated.

"BON VOYAGE."

BY REV. D. S. CLARK, D. D.

Perhaps we ought to say "Bon Pilgrimage," since the voyage is but a small part of the anticipated experience of The Congregationalist's party setting out for "Old World Shrines." Yet the voyage comes first, as you are likely to discover. Fortunate are you that it is to be made on that splendid ship so worthy by name and appointment to convey back to the mother country the sons and daughters of them who so long ago—as we Americans count the years—came over the sea for God and freedom of conscience's sake, to plant Congregationalism on these virgin shores.

"Time brings in his revenges." Now there is welcome at cathedral, university and guildhall doors to the schismatics, whom once the king and ecclesiastic would "harry out of the land." Would that we all might go and receive the meed of justice, so long delayed, from British lips and hands! Would we all were among the elect who again, as at the first, have been "sifted out of a continent" by The Congregationalist patent mesh for this joy and honor! Alas! as in politics, the choice does not fall on us! It is the other man who is called and we are invited to offer him our congratulations.

This we do heartily, universally: "All the saints salute you." We are told there are in your company all sorts and conditions of Congregationalists—lawyers, teachers, merchants, physicians, ministers and some women, possibly of the "new" variety, of course no old. We tremble at the thought of these "falling out by the way," and so repeat the Josephic admonition.

Your leader is no novice in the pilgrimage business. He has conducted already a considerable band into the very presence of Rameses the Great and to the Holy City itself. He knows what labors, dangers and sufferings are involved in the task. He can curb the rash, cheer the faint, bear with the grumbler and command when he must.

His "sesame" has the magic charm to open many places closed to the curious traveler, and lords and bishops and lackeys do him homage, for his is a prevailing name. His is the habit of getting things, Dun. He can speak, discreetly as Solomon, on any topic from Dutch currency to higher criticism, or the best specifics against heresy or seasickness. By the way, we advise you to leave "brush remedies" to the cats, and take your tossing and qualms in that heroic Christian spirit they did on the Mayflower. The "Gem of the Ocean" will do as little in the way of upsetting you as any craft, even if you do not have a gimbal-hung stateroom. You need not hesitate at every chance to lay in one of the Columbia's square meals. Show to the cynical worldlings how "powerful them pious eats."

Then to the daily promenade, the stirring strains of the orchestra, the dozing in the hired chair, the "light reading," the plowing through fog banks to the cheerful toot of the whistle, the excitement of a passing "liner," the noisy laugh over antique stories and the first sighting of Albion's chalky cliffs—how we all would like to share in these.

So you are really going—by way of the Establishment premises—to see where noble and simple ideals first germinated in true souls! Scrooby and Austerfield are to unfold their secrets to you. No grandeur of Exeter and Wells and Salisbury is to persuade you that it is better to "enrich" your "service" after the church pattern. As psalm singers and lovers of unrobed ministers and white window glass and hard pews, you, Puritans and Pilgrims, are now to offer your silent protests against all that is spectacular in worship; to "kiss" no "calves" of abominations, parading in the name of religion, though all do it over there. Remember the eyes of a denomination are on you as faithful witnesses. May you be equal to the test!

Neither are you to inveigh against strange customs and silly rules. We shall expect you all to remember to say "carriage" and "lift" and "tram" and "tuppence" and "boots" and "tarts," and never let slip a Yankee "guess." They didn't at Brewster's house or Bunyan's cottage.

London is to receive, amaze and weary you by its endless stretches of monotonous streets, historic buildings and oppressive problems. You won't solve all the latter, but don't try to do the British Museum, or to remember all the inscriptions on the monuments in the Abbey. Leave something for the next time, or there won't be any next time.

Breakfasts is the name of them—those semi-gustatory, semi oratorical receptions, of which we learn you are to have your fill. "Go to, let us have a breakfast," will be the first serious proposition we shall hear on your return. Philanthropy is in it and culture and creature benefit. The Puritans will have all the needed salt in themselves.

Our dear Congregational appendix—our "proselyte of the gate" at Oxford! How proud you will be as you walk about it and count its neo-classic towers, with never a rook condescending to make its nest in them! We all join in any hurrahs with which you may rashly break the dignified silence of that cloistered retreat. We do not care if you wake Wolsey from his sleep to see how the Protestant thrives, where he was once anathematized and burned. As you journey, in true Pilgrim fashion, to the tomb of Becket, not on palfrey and prancing steed, but via the London & South Western R. R., we enjoin you to reserve, every one, your "Canterbury tale" till we can have it at first hand. We empower you to contribute our Peter's Pence for the restoration of the ancient fane, as our good friend, the Dean, cordially invites all generous Americans to do.

Across the yeasty stretch of waters, in the realm of flaunting windmills and piles of red cannon ball cheeses, clatter of sabots and jingle of guldens, how will you survive, unless by the same honest hearts as the first fugitives did? Settle it for us, whether our fathers were more Dutchmen than Englishmen. If you can get any more "light" from John Robinson on that matter, bottle it and let it "break forth" on arrival here. We rejoice that you cannot stay long there, lest your morals suffer in the corrupt atmosphere as did those of the Pilgrim youth. Paris the gay, and Heidelberg the romantic, and Lucerne the beautiful—the names make us almost wild with desire to set foot within their borders. Some, with a preference for $H^2O$, still find it desirable to drink "the wine of the country," but, brethren, "we are persuaded better things of you, though we thus speak."

Sunrises on the Righi, castles on the Rhine, the mysterious concoctions of the table d'hôte, these crowd upon our imagination till envy stirs within us and we crack some of the commandments. This is our consolation—soon the days will have passed and you be headed like the Star of Empire, a rested, wise, enthusiastic band of travelers, who have done what you could to seal more firmly the bonds which unite Briton and American, and to bring in the everlasting years of peace and the latter day glory of our Congregational order. So we say to the good ship Columbia,

> Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea!
> Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee,
> . . . . . .
> Are all with thee—are all with thee.

The New Congregational House.

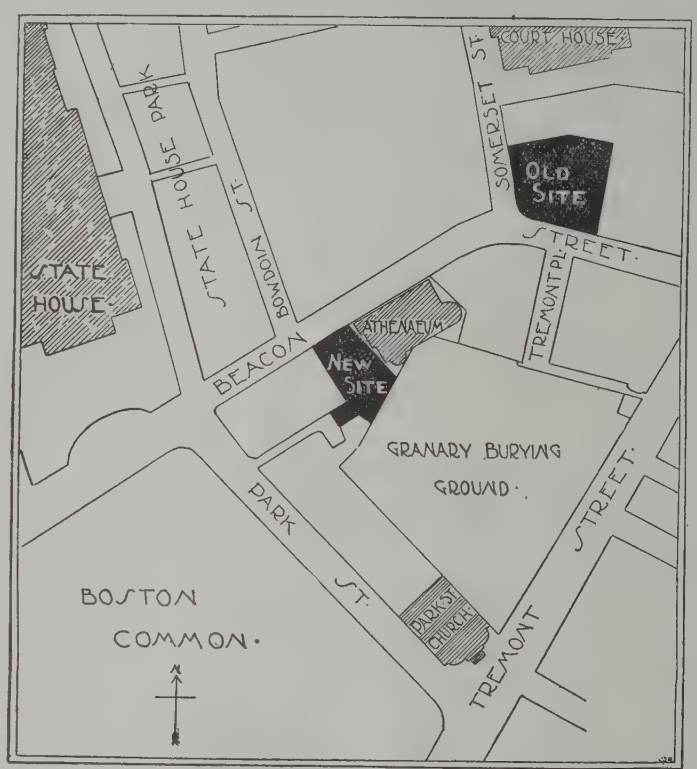
It is now fully six years since the project of a new denominational headquarters in Boston began to receive frequent and serious discussion. It was felt that the structure occupied since 1873 was becoming too shabby and inadequate, and that the march of improvements was bringing about an inevitable change, though just how soon it would come no one could forecast. The fact that new and spacious buildings were going up in close proximity, making the present Congregational House by contrast all the more dingy and unattractive, had, no doubt, something to do with bringing about a feeling of unrest and desire for better things. No one had the temerity to dispute the proposition that a denomination possessed of such resources and animated with such an energetic spirit as ours ought to have, here in its citadel, a structure that should compare favorably with similar edifices in Boston and other great cities of the land, but just how the ideal should be actualized was the perplexing question.

The first formal step was taken in the appointment of a committee, whose efforts are recalled in connection with a meeting of the Congregational Club, when a first attempt was made to secure pledges sufficient to guarantee the undertaking. The plan at that time was to tear down the present building and replace it on the same spot by a lofty and commodious structure, which should afford much office room in addition to what was needed for more strictly denominational uses. Such a plan involved the giving outright of considerable money, or the loaning of it on second mortgage bonds, which were not expected to bear interest the first year.

This earnest endeavor happened, unfortunately, to coincide with the approach of hard times and after a while it came practically to a standstill. In the meantime the present building has been growing still more unsuited to occupancy, and its inmates, while endeavoring to possess their souls in a measure of patience, have not been slow to express their sentiments on the subject in public and private. About two months ago, in response to a communication from the tenants, the directors appointed a special committee, and at its head was placed Mr. S. B. Capen, who, as a member of the standing finance committee of the association, had for a long while been canvassing all the possibilities in the case. Associated with him in this new committee were Messrs. E. A. Studley, S. B. Pratt, A. S. Lovett, J. A. Lane, Rev. Joshua Coit and A. C. Farley. The recent happy consummation is due to the appointment of this committee and its subsequent labors and to Mr. Samuel Johnson, the president of the association, who has exhibited constant interest in the undertaking.

At first there was a disposition to consider carefully sites in the South End and Back Bay districts, and the refusal of a desirable lot on Copley Square was secured. But there being grave objections to so radical a change in locality, another site on Beacon Hill at the corner of Hancock and Mount Vernon Streets was taken into consideration and a refusal of it for thirty days was obtained.

The drift of opinion by this time was altogether in favor of abandoning the present site and the plan for a great building and instead the ideal was set up of a moderate sized edifice, distinctive in character and architecture and designed principally for denominational uses. Then came the April meeting of the Congregational Club, which had an important bearing upon the final outcome. Here Mr. Capen presented the situation, stated the reasons why it seemed best not to go to the Back Bay and not to go into a great commercial enterprise in which general business should overshadow missionary interests. His logic was convincing to the club. But another and still more noteworthy result of Mr. Capen's address was that it was the means of disclosing the site finally selected. Though diligent search had been made through the Beacon Hill district and the territory adjacent to it, the site at No. 12 and 14 had escaped the vigilant eyes of the most alert real estate men, for the fact that the city has possession of it just now and quarters there certain municipal departments gave the impression that it was not in the market. But only a day or two after Mr. Capen's address a gentleman who had heard about it came to him and practically offered it. Its desirability was at once apparent. Only a few steps from the present house, on high ground, with remarkable advantages in air and light, midway between the different railroad stations, close to the business heart of the city and therefore easy of access to the gentlemen who are obliged to resort to the denominational headquarters in frequent fulfillment of committee duties, no spot throughout the length and breadth of Boston could be more satisfactory.



It did not take long to secure the necessary formal action on the part of the directors, for its most solid supporters, including men of high standing in the financial world, immediately saw that an exceptional opportunity was at hand. Already there was in the hands of the special committee an offer for the present building, which was subsequently increased, so, with a customer for the present structure knocking at one door and with most desirable goods brought to the other, the committee was in a complacent state of mind.

We are not yet at liberty to give the exact figures touching the purchase and sale. They are, however, very satisfactory numerals from the denominational point of view. It is understood that the sum realized by the sale of the present property is sufficient not only to purchase the new site but to provide a handsome surplus for the building fund, and the debt upon the new structure will probably not be burdensome. Another gratifying feature is the right to remain in the present building for two, and, if need be, for three years, thus obviating two changes and all the incidental trouble of cramped and doubtless unsatisfactory temporary accommodations during the process of building. Moreover, the site chosen is sure to grow more desirable as the years advance. It has been decided to cut down Bowdoin Street ten feet and to widen it, while the buildings on the corner of Beacon and Mt. Vernon are to be torn down and the ground on which they stand converted into a park, so the occupants of our new house will have a delightful prospect on which to rest their eyes. The wants of our unique and valuable library will be amply provided for, a modern stack library capable of holding 100,000 volumes and a fine reading-room being contemplated.

The city will not vacate its quarters until October 1, soon after which date the process of demolition will doubtless begin, and while the uncertainty that attaches to all building operations makes it hazardous to speak in exact terms, it is probable that a year and a quarter or a year and a half at most will suffice for the erection of the new building.

The Present Ministerial Distress.

A Variety of Opinions on a Subject of Immediate Consequence.

Modern Prophets.

The recent articles in The Congregationalist on this subject have shown some deplorable facts connected with the ministry. Wise lessons have been deducted, but I am sure the most important difficulty has not yet been mentioned. The reform must begin with the ministers. The ancient prophet was called "the man of God"; his modern representative should be such. The true man of God is infinitely more anxious to be doing the will of God than securing personal and worldly advantages. The disgrace of the disciples was their desire for first places in the anticipated kingdom, but when they understood their mission and were filled with the Holy Ghost that self-seeking disappeared, and their wonderful power as the servants of God was manifest. What the ministry of today needs is to be purged from worldly seeking and be filled with the unselfish spirit of Christ. Let this baptism come upon us ministers and most of the disgraceful scramble for vacant pulpits and the pressure upon the churches would be removed.

Is it not true that the cause of most of the unrest is that ministers are not willing to stay in the difficult places and are over-anxious for social advantages and cultured communities? Young men accept small, struggling churches merely as stepping-stones to more agreeable positions. They soon become impatient for promotion, ignore the leading of God and, taking matters into their own hands, watch The Congregationalist for resignations and join the army of applicants for a hearing. They importune friends to intercede for them and bring every pressure to bear to secure the coveted place.

The "oldest inhabitant" was accustomed to see ministers settle for life. The minister considered his location permanent and, with singleness of heart, went about to make the best of his opportunities. Once a pastor becomes dissatisfied with his people the keen edge of his power is gone. His heart is not in his work; it becomes drudgery and results meager. The pastor that falls in love with his people will find that love reciprocated and will not "mark time." Pulpits should not be considered prizes but grave responsibilities. To be the faithful pastor of a struggling church of 100 members and $800 salary is just as grand in the sight of God as to be the popular pastor of a cultured church of 500 members, with $5,000 salary, and often more spiritually productive. One question, Has a minister any moral right to hold on to a church for the sake of support when he is an obstacle to its successful work? E. W. P.

Young Men Discouraged.

A pastor of two small mission churches finds himself confronted with this question, What shall he say to three young men under his charge whose thoughts have been turned toward the ministry? They are men of marked power, of several years experience in the work of the church, and during the past winter have all passed through a remarkable experience in which the work of the Holy Spirit has been peculiarly manifested. They are not excited, nor fanatically inclined; they have embraced no peculiar doctrine or ideas, but are simply so quickened by the Spirit of God as to be led to devote themselves without reserve to the service of Christ. In patience and in prayerful faith they are waiting for the more definite leading which shall determine what that service shall be. Ten years ago their pastor would have unhesitatingly decided that their experience coupled with their undoubted ability and fitness for the work of the ministry constituted a "call" to that high office.

But times have changed. The pastor himself is a victim. He left a church with a salary of $2,500 because of the unrest of a handful of "leading men" and spent four years in the endeavor to find another pastorate, and is now in the mission field at a far less salary than he could command when he left the seminary fifteen years ago. There are no gray hairs to mark his approach to the dead line, and his record is clean as vouched for by several of the leading ministerial associations of New England. His work has been blessed during the past winter in the conversion of more than half a hundred souls and in the organization of a church which will quadruple its membership before the year is gone. Yet he is confronted with the fact that, if his work were done today in his present field, he would in all probability be driven back into the business into which he was forced during his four years "vacation."

Now what shall he say to these young men, eager to devote their lives to the service of the Lord? In simple honesty and candor, and out of personal love to them, he has felt constrained to talk to them out of his own experience, to discuss with them some of the recent articles in The Congregationalist touching the question of ministerial supply, and he has advised them to wait. And, unless present conditions change, he does not see the way clear to substitute that word for any other. Meantime he is laying plans to utilize as best he can this talent in his own parish. But when he thinks of ministers within the range of his acquaintance who are unworthy, of many more whom these young men in the ordinary course of things would far excel in intellectual and particularly in spiritual efficiency and power, his heart is saddened at the thought that all this energy must be practically lost to the church and to the world.

Is the pastor wrong? Is this spiritual force superfluous? Have we more talent than we can utilize? Does God baptize young men with the Holy Ghost and with power, and create within them a consuming zeal for his kingdom, to fit them for the service of a missionary parish when the field is already adequately equipped with laborers? These are questions the pastor is trying to answer for himself. S. E. W.

Plenty of Room—Little Money.

Are there too many ministers? As long as a single pastor in the West is compelled to care for three or four parishes, when he might find enough to do in one; as long as there are many localities in the West where now there is no church, and a church is desirable; as long as there are feeble churches in New England, even, without pastors; as long as there are in the foreign field "nine hundred millions of souls that have not yet even heard of Christ"; as long as Christ continues saying, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature"—how can it be said till the work is all done that there are too many ministers?

The trouble is, there is not sufficient money to send and support the ministers in fields where they are most needed. There is wealth enough in the churches to do this, but it is not consecrated to God. When Christians become as deeply in earnest in the Lord's conquest of the world as the men and women of the Confederacy were in their cause, when the people of God shall become as determined to defeat Satan and his legions as our forefathers were to conquer the British "Redcoats," and ready for sacrifices similar to theirs, if need be, in order to gain speedy victory, there will be no lack of means to make conquest of this land, and even the whole world, for Christ, and then there will be no faithful ministers waiting for a field.

O, the fearful responsibility of the possession of wealth! But it may become also a blessed responsibility. What blessedness there is in bringing souls into the kingdom of God! But the responsibility of the conquest of the world for Christ does not rest alone with the rich. The Lord is watching the widows with their mites now, even as in the temple treasury of old. Every individual saved by Christ, be he rich or poor, shares in the responsibility. Why cannot the church rise to this emergency—this great duty? Then, if there are any ministers standing around without a charge because they are looking for "soft places," they will meet with the scorn that the soldier encounters when he shrinks from a post that calls for self-sacrifice and courage.

Let Churches Go Slowly.

I would suggest as a help toward the solution of the problem that churches should not be in so much haste to find a successor to the outgoing pastor. Usually before the dismissing council has said its last word speculation is awake as to the next man. All are eager to know who he shall be. The feeling is that nothing can be done till this question is settled, and therefore public worship, church work and even personal religion amount to very little, because "we are without a minister." So the pressure for immediate action seems imperative.

But why not wait a little? The situation, in most cases, to say the least, is extremely unfavorable for action on so important a matter as calling a minister. Many are mourning the loss of a pastor just dismissed. Many feel that he ought not to have gone and are laying the blame on some disturbing faction in the church. They are too much grieved to think of putting a stranger in his place and, just at present, can give no fair hearing to any one else. Others are rather glad the old minister is gone and are too ready for action. They are pleased with the first new face and, perhaps, just as well pleased with another next Sunday and still better suited as the procession lengthens. Still others feel that the last pastor was not treated as he ought to have been and are determined to block the wheels till that sin is atoned for. Such things, and others equally foolish, make the opening of a ministerial canvass anything but promising and, if allowed very much freedom, the church will soon be further from a choice than when it began, and very likely will be obliged to cut short the dreary business by a desperate vote for an unsuitable man after all. Then comes a short, unsatisfactory pastorate and the church has to go into another campaign. Generally speaking, the church that has just lost a pastor is not in good condition to get one.

Now would it not be well for every church without a pastor, instead of tiring themselves out trying to get a suitable minister for themselves, to try to make themselves suitable for a good minister? Let them give up all thought for the present of getting a minister, not talk about it nor think about it. Get a good man for stated supply—say for a month or several months—give him a chance to preach the gospel of the kingdom and not a gospel of the candidate. He must be known himself as being counted out of the list of all possible candidates. Then there will be nothing to think of but the "gracious words that proceed out of his mouth," and the church will, for a short period at least, have "rest." J. W. B.

Calmness and Confidence.

In every section of our land this is a period of panic and perplexity in ecclesiastical as well as commercial circles. In both the great need is calmness for today and confidence for tomorrow. Capital is timorous because of lessened revenues and future uncertainties; so are many of our churches and ministers. The financial pressure on business men is necessarily felt in church finances, and there is a distinct gain when both churches and ministers clearly connect their present restlessness with these commercial conditions, which are sure to change. Ministers are not the only class in the community who are suffering from reduced income and professional competition. Churches are not the only corporations whose treasuries are perplexingly low. The sentiment which one of a group of newsboys put on a leaf of a gift-calendar for the surgeon who had helped a comrade is capable of wide application: "Keep kool; 'twon't last; nuthin' does!" Whenever a revival of business comes to this land, there will be a coincident lessening of the tension of many a pastorate.

But till then? One suggestion—more frankness between the pastor and representative boards of his church. The actual making or breaking of the pastoral tie requires the action of the entire church, but the delicate strengthening or safe loosening of this tie demands a loving and mutual confidence and co-operation at this point, quietly but continuously maintained. Let the mutuality of the relation be constantly emphasized. Let the minister jealously guard the welfare of the church as a whole, and let the church remember that the minister's reputation, as well as his character, is a part of his capital that must not be recklessly impaired. Let the minister face the possibility of voluntary sacrifice for the church at the bidding of a Master who sacrificed all, but let the church see to it that it never sacrifices the minister. Let the minister learn the real sentiments of the church, and let its leaders know the actual financial necessities of the pastor. The mutual understanding and sympathy resulting will perhaps postpone the threatened disruption of the pastorate, and may prevent it for years to come. S.

Work for Ministerial Immigrants.

Some good people seem to be disturbed even by the threatened ministerial immigration. Notes of warning are sounded now and then. It is intimated that men who have not been born and brought up to the Congregational order are not the pastors to be sought. Traditions will stick to them. Their sympathies cannot be fully enlisted. They do not adapt themselves readily. They are not loyal. So it is said, and with some show of reason. The fear is not wholly groundless. If a high church view of the Congregational order is to be maintained, or provincial feelings are to predominate, the warning may well be heeded.

But what about the simple fact that faces us? There are a number of clergymen in different denominations, many of them scholarly men, practical men, good men, who have their views of truth and feelings of brotherhood wonderfully enlarged in these days; so much so that they find themselves all out of and beyond their old traditional limitations. What of them? Where are they to go? If they look toward the freer Congregational order for places of service, are they to be blamed? Are they to be slighted? Are they not rather to be encouraged? Or is it a mistake and a misfortune that the Congregational order should be thought less provincial and less sectarian than most other denominations?

If they are to be encouraged, to be welcomed, the question is, how? What is to be done? The answer given may seem impracticable. It may even raise a smile. But it is not without reason. While in nearly all desirable centers churches and ministers are closely crowded together, there are many fields left unprovided for. Such we find not in new settlements or on the borders only. We find them in old country districts and in large sections of our growing cities. There is much of the provincial and class character about our churches of all denominations. They must move where their own people are, where the money for their support can be easily raised, where they can keep up their traditional distinctions, so they locate at the business centers or in the fashionable neighborhoods. The Methodist Church even, has for some time been leaving, more or less, its blessed work among the ignorant and the poor, and is following the fashions.

If the Congregational order will be truly national, unprovincial, unsectarian, cosmopolitan and catholic, and organize a number of what shall be practically union churches in all such fields as are left destitute, it will open doors of service for the men who are standing ready to do just that kind of work. The idea is not to organize churches and then supply them with men, but to get the men to go to work and organize the churches.

But where is the money to come from? Let us remember how willing people are to pay large sums for their fashionable religious establishments and literary institutions. Also, that many wealthy men and women hardly know how to spend their incomes. Is it not getting to be possible to awaken their interest in efficient, well-distributed, union mission work? Plain, but comfortable auditoriums will have to be built with such annexes as each locality may require. Christian workers who cannot serve at their own charges will need a generous support until the churches they gather about them are able to assume the entire financial burden. The very best men will be needed—men every way qualified and truly devoted; men who will enter such fields with a firm purpose to secure definite results. Benefactions, whether private and direct, or through the home mission society, must be so ample that the work shall at no point suffer for lack of means.

H. U.

Let Us Do Something.

If statements regarding the alleged crowded state of the Congregational ministry are unfounded, they are calculated to harm both churches and ministers, and the sooner they cease the better. If they are founded on fact I should be glad to know it, and also the cause of the fact. For if the Congregational ministry is over-crowded, it becomes a serious question with me whether I ought to give or encourage others to give to the Congregational Education Society, the express purpose of which is to assist young men to enter the ministry. If there are already too many Congregational ministers, why advise young men to embrace the ministerial calling? There is a society in this State to increase the ministry—should not that society be abolished? How about our theological seminaries and their rivalry in the effort to secure as large a number as possible of students? If there are too many Congregational ministers, ought not those who have influence with the churches to make a concentrated and intelligent effort to decrease the number of ministers? I should be glad of light on this subject. It is time we knew the facts and faced them. I am tired of complaints; let us do something. W. H.

The Plague of Self-Seeking.

A recent issue of The Congregationalist contained two references to this subject. One stated that the announcement of a vacancy in a single home missionary church brought in one week thirty applications to supply this want, and that from all parts of the Union where our denomination is represented except the Pacific slope. Moreover, this was but the early rain which became a cloudburst, until the clerk of the church, who had a use for his time, abandoned all attempt to answer the various letters. In the other instance the clerk had resorted to an expedient similar to one said to have been once employed by a gentleman of wealth whose mail brought frequent requests for money. He employed a printed form of denial.

Energy invested in seeking a better place is not available to better the place in which the applicant then is. Some people look to the clergy to aid in the work of municipal reform. There is a difference about the desirability of their doing so, but there can be none that, whether they are to withstand self-seeking politicians or not, they should do themselves the honor to avoid the eager aggressiveness which is one of the worst demoralizations of politics.

Such a condition, become general and permanent, would be a temptation which cannot be too carefully avoided. If many clergymen seek their own promotion, each may say, "I must do what every one else does to secure even a fair field for my merits, such as they are. I dislike it, even detest it, but necessity unhappily makes no allowance for taste." The writer of one of the articles referred to is inclined to blame the clergy for the rise of such a condition. If so, correction may have to come from the churches. If they will they can abate this nuisance promptly, at least as far as Massachusetts is concerned, and that to the great relief and benefit of all parties interested.

A vacant church might instruct its committee of supply to consider no nominations save such as arose in reply to the previous inquiries of the committee itself. Such a course would favor the committee with an opportunity to make its own inquiries. It could not properly be adopted in States where there is no ministerial bureau to discharge for the clergyman his natural right of seeking employment wherever he can find it. In this State, where such an agency exists, there can be no hardship in requiring it to supersede the personal efforts of the clergyman himself, because it can do his work for him better than he can do it for himself, in respect of taste and in other respects. If the conditions described in the articles mentioned are at all general, there cannot be too soon a National Bureau of Ministerial Supply to close a situation vexatious to the churches and perilous to the standing of their ministry. C. H. H.

Plenty of Room Abroad.

One class of people the world around will read the letter voicing the dissatisfaction and anxiety of pastors with a sigh, not of sympathy but of longing. They are a class who are so overwhelmed with "calls" to tempting fields new and old that they sometimes wish they might resort to Ulysses's expedient in order to save mind and body for the specific work in hand. Instead of finding thirty applicants for every desirable place, they find thirty places applying for them urgently!

These enviable people are your foreign missionaries. We read of the long-prayed-for awakening in China, of the unparalleled opportunity now at hand in Turkey, of whole "heathen" villages in India literally begging for Christian teaching, and then find here at home such an embarrassment of riches as is described, can you wonder at our surprise (which under great stress sometimes rises dangerously near indignation) at this strange blindness to the signs of the times?

We may point to the depleted treasuries of our missionary societies, but does not our heart condemn that the next moment as a superficial argument, possibly an excuse? Secretary Smith once stated it as a broad, general working principle of the American Board that every missionary sent out created a constituency approximately sufficient for his support. We recognize the magnificent underlying truth of this statement, which, so far as I know, has never been recalled. Our beloved Dr. Clark with almost his last breath prophesied a great missionary revival near at hand. The unevangelized world is critically ready for it. What other sight could be imagined more fitted to inspire and hasten this here at home than a grand turning to the Gentiles among the many men and women of talent and consecration who are finding the avenues for their high usefulness here already overcrowded and closed? Here also we must have "a swift and accurate adaptation of organism to environment." C. A. S.

QUATRAINS.

BY CLARENCE HAWKES.

THE AFTERGLOW.

After the day is done the passing light
Sheddeth a halo round the feet of night;
So after death a noble life may shed
Soft radiance where they that live must tread.

NIAGARA.

Niagara—sublime, eternal, grand,
Rolling thy thundrous torrent ceaselessly,
Thou art one drop from out the boundless sea
That resteth in the hollow of God's hand.

COMPENSATION.

The little streamlet feeds the mighty sea,
And ocean pays its tribute to the hills;
So man to man, whether he knows or wills,
Gives and receives from all humanity.

THE UNDERTOW.

Ah! do not judge thy fellowman,
For none can see and none can know
The strength of life's dark undertow;
He may be doing all he can.

The plan of observing a "Mother's Day" in the public schools was the happy thought of a Massachusetts teacher, and in several other States a day is now set apart for this purpose. For six weeks prior to the occasion daily preparations are made in the shape of a five minutes' drill in songs and recitations in praise of motherhood and the home. Provision is also made for inculcating patriotic sentiments. When the time comes for exhibition parents are invited to spend the afternoon at the school. After exercises by the children, each teacher makes a brief address, showing the reciprocal duties of parents and teachers, then follows an informal reception which affords a fine opportunity for the interchange of opinions between them. An ideal celebration of this character, however, should include a representation of fathers as well as mothers. This would necessitate holding the exercises in the evening, but would prevent the children from imbibing the notion that the father's only office in the home is to provide for its material needs.

Professor Giddings of Columbia College, in a thoughtful article in Good Housekeeping, calls attention to some defects in home training which partially explain certain educational deficiencies in young people for which the schools and colleges have been blamed. Speaking of the relation between the culture of the home and that which may be obtained at college, he says that a young man or woman who goes to college from an ambitious but uncultivated family, in whose home the great events of history and the great creations of literature are never talked about in a familiar way, will seldom attain to the highest scholarship and will rarely master all the niceties of the English language. The boy or girl who has always heard his native tongue spoken correctly and musically and who can associate all that is most beautiful in literature with the tones of his mother's voice starts with an advantage which no subsequent college training can furnish. Here is an incentive for parents to discuss worthy themes in household conversation.

The season was the season of sweet June,
Whose sunny hours from morning until noon
Went creeping through the day with silent feet,
Each with its load of pleasure, slow yet sweet;
Like the long years of blest eternity,
Never to be developed.

PATCHWORK.

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

In a recent removal from home to home I came upon a small basket filled with patchwork. It touched my heart, brought tears to my eyes and awoke a train of tender memories, for these little squares of cambric, where tiny stitches were daintily set, were the favorite leisure work of my dear mother, long since gone to her rest. The qualities of patience, thoroughness, persistence, improvement of time and wise economy, which belonged to her more than to any one I have ever known as intimately, were shown for me in the delicate patchwork, almost the last sewing she ever did.

It came to me as I lingered over the little work-basket that much of woman's strength and thought must necessarily, whatever be her era, go into bits of toil, into patching and piecing and mending, and making much out of little. Not only in the sewing line. My friend, Ra D., who is very useful in her church and a leading spirit in the girls' club, as well as an active worker in city missions, said to me the other day: "I am perplexed and out of heart by the numerous interruptions I have to bear with. I never get a clear field and a large piece of work laid out for it that my time isn't chopped up into bits by the people who call, the questions I have to answer and the letters I must write. I am simply ready to drop everything and run away."

"Patchwork," I thought, as I soothed Ra and told her she was tired and must rest a little, not feeling that the whole world depended for its management on her. We are apt to feel that our efforts are indispensable and that if we did fall out the work would stop, whereas it would not even be arrested. God's work never stops, though the workers grow weary and are transferred to other or higher spheres of service. When we are chronically tired, harassed and fretted we would best take a breathing spell, but we may as well understand that first and last we have to weave a good deal of patchwork into the pattern of our lives.

I met Deacon W. on the train one morning last week, and I thought the good man was less at ease than usual. Evidently the deacon had something on his mind. By and by it came out and I learned that the smoothness of the church life was disturbed by some unfraternal differences of opinion. There was no actual quarrel going on, but there was friction and jealousy and there had been the speaking of words that prick, and the exchange of cold looks, so that there was a want of serenity.

But the deacon brightened after he had poured out his soul. "Mrs. Saintclever," he observed, "our minister's wife, has so much tact and is so much beloved I think she will straighten out the tangle. She belongs to the set of whom our Lord said, 'Blessed are the peacemakers.' One cannot see how she does it, one never hears of her saying anything remarkable, but she smooths ruffled feathers, and puts people into good humor, and makes everybody happy. It's a great thing for Mr. Saintclever that he has that kind of a wife."

"Yes," I thought, "she understands patchwork."

Among the accomplishments of the new woman, however numerous they may be, let not this be excluded. The talent for utilizing the scraps, the talent for adjusting difficulties, the talent for bringing harmony out of discord, the womanly talent for accepting interruptions with grace and sweetness as part of the divine ordering for the day, the talent, in short, for patchwork, must not be despised.

"A small unkindness is a great offense," said Hannah More. Conversely, a little deed of kindness may count large and full in the record of the watching angels.

A HISTORICAL ORGAN.

BY FRANK S. FREEMAN.

Last summer I had the pleasure of visiting a beautiful home in Boston and there examining the old pipe organ on which was composed the tune Coronation, so dear to all lovers of church psalmody. This historic musical instrument is the property of Mrs. Fannie A. Tyler, a granddaughter of Oliver Holden, the composer of the immortal tune. Mrs. Tyler entertains in the true old-style hospitality, and shows to all, with pleasure and satisfaction, this valued memento of her heritage.

The history of Coronation contains many notable incidents, and the old tune has lost none of its inspiring influence as we hear it today. This fact is well attested by a memorable episode which occurred at last year's convention of the Y. P. S. C. E., when one of the most striking and impressive displays of feeling was brought forth by the singing of this tune. On the first day, as the delegates were assembling, there was much pleasant rivalry between different sections of the hall. At one place hundreds were singing Marching Through Georgia. Others expressed their sentiments in Maryland, My Maryland. Up in the gallery delegates were uniting in Nearer, My God, to Thee. Below many were voicing At the Cross. And so there was a program of song of very miscellaneous character, each melody differing somewhat at the hands of its "moving mates." All at once a few good singers in the body of the house began to sing Coronation, and little by little every other song died away, all uniting in the noblest sentiment of all time:

All hail the power of Jesus' name,
Let angels prostrate fall,
Bring forth the royal diadem
And crown him Lord of all.

The effect of this mighty volume of melody was well-nigh magical. Enthusiasm swayed the assembled multitude, and when the song was ended the whole vast assembly cheered spontaneously.

Oliver Holden, the composer of the tune, was a carpenter whose love of music carried him into the study and composition of religious melodies. He was born in Shirley in 1765, and early in life moved to Charlestown where at the age of twenty-seven he wrote the tune which will carry his name to all future generations. Mrs. Tyler describes her grandfather as tall, slender, with long, silver-gray hair, combed back from his perfectly smooth face. He usually wore a soft, gray dressing-gown and a broad-rimmed, black Quaker hat and carried a cane. He had a powerful bass voice, with a peculiarly magnetic quality that often touched his listeners to tears. His three children inherited his musical gifts, and together they constituted a delightful family quartet. He was also a fine reader and at one time was a preacher in Charlestown.

Considering the part it bore in giving to the world the divine tune, it was with no little interest that I examined the old organ and with almost reverent touch pressed the keys, now yellow with age. The old relic is quite susceptible to climatic changes, and some of the pipes were consequently not in tune, but those that were gave forth tones of singular sweetness and beauty. As will be seen from the accompanying illustration, which is reproduced from a photograph obtained through the kindness of Mrs. Tyler, the old organ presents an appearance of venerable simplicity. The case is of hard wood and, notwithstanding its great age, is perfectly free from any signs of decay. The workmanship throughout was evidently very thorough, though the exterior is decidedly plain and severe. There is no ornamentation whatever, not even a corner rounded, but all lines are as sharp and hard as the lives of the Puritans in the days when the old instrument was built. The hight of the case is about seven, and the width nearly four, feet. The upper part contains the pipes, which are exposed to view when the swing doors are opened. The bellows occupy the lower part of the case and can be blown by the use of a handle at the end of the organ, or, if desired, by a treadle in the front part. The keyboard is a simple affair in comparison with the organ of today, provided with its several banks of keys, numerous stops and electrical appliances. The compass is four and one-half octaves, not an extended one, surely, but capable of great results, as we know from the tune Coronation. The two knobs at each end of the keyboard, seen in the illustration, regulate the tone and comprise the few stops of the organ.

It is not known just when this old instrument was made, but from what we know of organs and their builders it was evidently built during the middle of the last century, and from a brass plate over the keyboard we know the makers were Astor & Company, 39 Cornhill, London. At the time that Mr. Holden's organ found a home in this country there were probably not more than a dozen such instruments in all New England, and these, with one or two exceptions, were contained in the Episcopal churches. The Puritan fathers, when they left their native shores to escape a religion of forms, naturally condemned and avoided all the outward show of the service of the Church of England, and among the things which to them seemed superfluous and reprehensible were instruments of music—organs in particular. These prejudices were not overcome until after the American Revolution, and it was then that organs were introduced into the homes and churches of the people of New England. Could the ancient instrument give a history of itself it could, no doubt, tell of many an interesting event in our history —of the time, for instance, when Washington was President, and how, a few years later, in 1799 it sounded forth his funeral anthem.

The old organ, so ripe in years and usefulness, was finally used by its owner a few days before his death in voicing music to the following prophetic words:

> God of my life, nigh draws the day
> When thou wilt summon me away,
> To dwell with those who live on high—
> To sin no more, no more to die.
> My youthful days and riper years,
> My joyful hours and hour of tears,
> Passing away like fleeting wind,
> Leave but a remnant yet behind.

When we remember this old relic's history, with its many hallowed associations, it has a charm for us that other instruments can never have, and which, although larger, more costly and possibly more beautiful, might well be imagined gladly to exchange places and graces with the old "Coronation organ."

"ARE OUR LADIES CRUEL?"

BY HELEN MARSHALL NORTH.

A few days ago, while walking on a side street in New York, there was suddenly thrown down close to my feet a number of dead birds, perhaps twenty. The man who had carried them had either dropped a part of his burden by accident or else he was stopping to readjust it. The soft little beauties, all clad in fresh spring plumage of brown and white, finer and more delicate than any fabric of the loom or hand, had each a death wound in its body; the pretty heads hung lifeless, the dainty wings would never again be lifted towards the summer sun, the tiny throats would never again swell with song.

Twenty dead birds! I asked the man and found out that they were on their way to a certain fashionable clubhouse to be served up at a grand dinner. On the bill of fare the little creatures would be commented on as a delicacy of the season; in the midst of a dozen or more courses they would serve as a single dainty morsel, enjoyed for a brief moment and forgotten in less time. But back in the woods these brown beauties would be sorely missed. In one nest and another and another among the branches some blind, unreasoning birdie would wonder and wonder, and perhaps die, because a bird mother or father or little young one did not come home. Twenty little birds for a rich man's pie! Twenty happy lives, short at best, suddenly stopped, and with no life beyond, we say!

Now, if these birdlings had been slain for their plumage to be used in adorning some lady's bonnet, what a fine, trenchant article might be written about that same vain and wicked lady. The caption of my article is borrowed from a recently-published paragraph calling attention to the heartlessness of women who wear birds' plumage and to the Massachusetts Audubon Society, the members of which are asked to pledge themselves 'to abstain from the use of feathers and wings of wild birds. Seeing those small brown creatures dead in the interest of gastronomy, I wondered whether this society might not justly add a clause for men who hunt and kill simply for their own gratification. And I wondered whether a tenth part as many birds are yearly sacrificed for the use of ladies' bonnets as for the pleasure of sportsmen and clubhouses.

No one seems to remember that the great menace to the life of our wild creatures, to birds, rabbits and squirrels, to deer and the lowly trout, perch and bass in the streams, is due not to the vanity of women, but to the—what shall we call it? Is it not the brutal, savage instinct of men who hunt and fish and take innocent life all summer, and who keenly enjoy the deadly shot, the cruel wound which brings a suffering, dying wild creature to their feet? Bullet wounds hurt when they go crashing through a man's body; a sharp steel hook causes cruel pain in a man's hand; what of the deer or partridge or robin, or the shining fish, happy in his home in the stream?

In the case of my twenty brown birds the excuse of necessary food could hardly be urged, as it might be in many a remote place where well-supplied markets are unknown, and where hunting and fishing are legitimate pursuits. How many of us have been urged to partake of tiny fish, the small product of a day's wandering up the stream and scarcely edible, just to gratify the pride of the fisherman? How many of us have eaten birds and squirrels for a similar reason, with small enjoyment and little thought of what the morsel meant?

Instead of one Audubon Society let us have at least two, the first finding its members among women who will abstain from wearing the plumage of wild birds. The second shall be a large society, and shall include, first, all men and boys who take the life of birds to gratify the appetite of fashionable gourmands, and also the gourmands themselves, pledged, of course, to reform; and second, all men who fish for the same purpose; third, all men, and especially ministers, who will abstain from hunting deer and other innocent wild animals for the pure pleasure of killing something. With a large membership in each society, all pledged in favor of the life of innocent creatures of the woods, "the low-moving throng," whose life is naturally brief, would, perchance, grow tamer, more like the human, even as man, abstaining from the indulgence of his savage instincts, would become less like the brutal.

Worse than digression is platitude.—John Morley.

CHARLES SUMNER.

BY JEANNETTE A. GRANT.

"When men trembled at duty and were afraid of it he did it faithfully. When corruption hung like a pestilence over our land, he stood up above it, brave and pure. His heart was full of care for the humblest of the race and the most oppressed."—Phillips Brooks.

Not long before his death, Charles Sumner, putting his hand on a young man's shoulder, said, "It is on you young men that we rely, and remember, young man, that character is everything." Massachusetts has a galaxy of glorious names upon her records, but none reflects so steadfast a light upon the "Old Bay State" as his. He was the product of her institutions, her schools, her patriotism, and he realized in his life the principles for which her founders were blest of God and revered by men. He was born in Boston in 1811, and to that beloved city he always returned as to a home, whether from his wearing political life at Washington, or from wanderings in foreign lands.

At the age of ten the boy was in the Boston Latin School preparing himself for Harvard, which he entered five years later. His college career was, like all the rest of his life, a struggle after the highest. He sought the society of older and wiser men, but among those of his own age was considered a genial and always gentlemanly companion. He was the tallest member of his class, although the youngest, had a manly form and voice and excellent health, all fitting him for the great orator he was shortly to become.

College graduation did not mean the end of study to a young man like Charles Sumner. After a year spent in reviewing and supplementing his studies he entered the Cambridge Law School, where he was not satisfied with the regular course, but made for himself exhaustive research in historic lore that he might trace to their source such legal questions as he had to deal with. It was said that he knew every volume in the law school library and could put his hand upon it in the dark.

The eminent Chief-Justice Story became Mr. Sumner's admired friend and instructor. From him he bore a flattering letter of introduction when, after finishing his course at the law school, he went abroad to study still more deeply the intricacies of the legal science. Leading members of the English bench and bar honored the young American who came so highly recommended. He was invited on a certain occasion to a seat with the lord chief justice of the king's bench. A point came up for consideration and Mr. Sumner was asked if any decision had ever touched such a point in American courts. He quickly replied, "No, your lordship, but the point has been decided in your lordship's court," and then cited the case. This was "a feather in the cap" of the visiting lawyer and laid the foundation of his fame in Europe.

Mr. Sumner's political career began with his magnificent oration on The True Grandeur of Nations, delivered in Boston on the Fourth of July, 1845, and pronounced by the English patriot, Richard Cobden, "the most noble contribution made by any modern writer to the cause of peace." Extracts from it should be learned by heart in every schoolroom of our land. In his researches for the preparation of his speech, Mr. Sumner was brought face to face with the problem of slavery then menacing our national prosperity. His sense of justice was aroused and he espoused the cause of the slaves with that eloquence which never faltered so long as life and strength remained. It was a daring course upon which the scholarly young civilian had entered, and brought upon him much undeserved obloquy and personal danger. But nature had endowed him with high ideals and great tenacity of purpose, so throughout his long public career Charles Sumner was always firm for what he felt to be the right. In reply to a senatorial friend who suggested that he must be careful about certain things that might affect his re-election, he said: "But I may die long before that, and as long as I live I can do my duty."

On the first day of December, 1851, Sumner made his appearance in the United States Senate. His maiden speech as a senator was delivered a few weeks later. Its theme was the celebrated exile, Louis Kossuth, and in the course of it he used the now famous expression, "Equality before the law." In all his speeches, on whatever subjects, we find sentences worthy of perpetual remembrance. To all his efforts he brought such richness of scholarship, such accurate comprehension, as are seldom equaled and never surpassed. His familiarity with literature, history and art gave him power to embellish even humdrum subjects. In a speech concerning the Iowa Railroad Bill he showed the importance of roads in a marvelous light. "Under God, the road and the schoolmaster are the two chief agents of human improvement," is one of its unique sentences.

But justice to the colored race was the eternal cause for which he sought every opportunity to plead. Earnestly, fearlessly he opposed the hated subject of slavery, incurring the fiercest wrath of its champions, who plotted together what might be done to destroy his influence. The result was worthy of savages of the lowest degradation. On the afternoon of May 22, 1856, the Senate having adjourned for the day, Mr. Sumner sat at his desk in the Senate chamber absorbed in writing. Without any warning there stood before him a Southern member of the House, and rained upon his bent head a succession of heavy blows from a gutta-percha cane, only desisting when the cane lay in fragments upon the floor where its victim had fallen, bleeding and insensible. The shock to Sumner's formerly magnificent physique was terrible, and its torturing effects went with him to the end of his life. Yet he strove to live to accomplish the freeing of his colored brethren, and after their freedom to secure to them equal rights. So painful and wearying was his physical existence that he said to his friend, Henry Wilson: "If my works were completed and my Civil Rights Bill passed, no visitor could enter that door that would be more welcome than death."

But sympathy for the martyr and the cause increased at the news of the horrible outrage offered in the name of Southern slaveholders. It was said, and truly, "Every drop of blood shed by him in this disgraceful affair has raised up 10,000 armed men." The cause went forward, but physical agony slowly quenched the life of its promoter, who passed from the midst of his labors at the age of sixty-three. He belongs to our national past, but the present has sore need of men who, like him, shall believe that "loyalty to principle is higher than loyalty to party."

Closet and Altar

The deepest prayer a human being can breathe was uttered by the Psalmist centuries ago: "O, knit my heart unto thee!"

In the ancient cathedral of Lubeck in Germany there is an old slab with the following inscription:

Thus speaketh Christ, our Lord, to us:
Ye call me Master, and obey me not;
Ye call me Light, and see me not;
Ye call me Way, and walk me not;
Ye call me Life, and desire me not;
Ye call me Wise, and follow me not;
Ye call me Fair, and love me not;
Ye call me Rich, and ask me not;
Ye call me Eternal, and seek me not;
Ye call me Gracious, and trust me not;
Ye call me Noble, and serve me not;
Ye call me Mighty, and honor me not;
Ye call me Just, and fear me not;
If I condemn you, blame me not.

A good prayer for us as we turn to God's Word in the still hour is the prayer David prayed—"Open thou mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law." There is such a thing as reading the Bible with closed, or only half-opened, eyes; we get little out of it that way. The disciples often failed to discern the meaning of Christ's words; their eyes were "holden" until they were unsealed by the divine touch, "then understood they." It is just so with us. We need to have "the eyes of our heart enlightened," that we may understand the great truths that can only be spiritually discerned. The Holy Spirit holds the key that unlocks these hidden treasures, and unseals our eyes to behold them. He alone can reveal them to us. He is the great interpreter. Christ said of the Spirit, "He shall glorify me: for he shall take of mine and shall declare it unto you." O, the sweet revelations of God's tender love and grace that come through the blessed Word to the heart the Spirit opens to receive them!—Mrs. C. L. G.

O God of truth, make me one with thee in eternal love. Oft am I weary, reading, listening, but all I wish and long for is in thee. Then silent be all teachers, speak thou to me alone.—Thomas à Kempis.

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, we present ourselves at thy mercy seat, to bring thee our sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving. Every day brings new proof of thy gracious care and increasing kindness. Take us, O Lord, again this day, and all the days of our lives, under thy divine care. Be thou our light, and guide our feet by thy holy word and spirit, that we may not walk in the darkness of our own ways, according to the desires of our flesh, but that we may have grace to live according to thy divine will. Prepare us, O Lord, for our daily work; and for our warfare against sin and Satan. We pray thee to look down upon all who stand in need of thy gracious help. Aid the sick, the afflicted and the needy. Hear the sighs and prayers of the bereaved and the despairing. Lift up the light of thy countenance upon all who are in the valley of the shadow of death, supporting them in their dangers, and bringing them safely into the land of everlasting rest. And finally bring us to the full enjoyment of thy heavenly kingdom. All of which we pray for, through infinite riches of grace in Christ our Lord. Amen.

48. TRANSPOSITION.

If rest is sweet when day has fled,
To weary arms and aching head,
Is't not as sweet and fairly won
When life's dull day at last is done,
And Death with darkness TWO my bed?

Why should I wish to toil instead
The treadmill round for daily bread?
Why wish from death that I be ONE,
If rest is sweet?

Will not the night be swiftly sped?
A land of rest will not I tread,
All THREE beneath a glorious sun?
Why, then, desire to restless run,
And why that deep, deep slumber dread
If rest is sweet?

THE CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL LEAGUE.

There have been occasional allusions in the Conversation Corner to the hospital cottages at Baldwinville for the poor children suffering from chronic diseases, and some of the Corner philatelists have exchanged stamps with the youthful patients in the hospital. Several inquiries having been made concerning the work, we take pleasure in stating that a league with the above name was formed five years ago, and since then children in various parts of the country have raised $6,000, whereby twenty-six of their helpless little friends have been enabled to enjoy the privileges of the hospital. But for this aid many of them would have been invalids or deformed for life. The contributions have come chiefly in small sums, raised by the boys and girls themselves, but an earnest effort is now being made to secure annual pledges from Sunday schools, King's Daughters circles and similar organizations, in order that this noble charity in behalf of the poor, sick children of Massachusetts may still be carried on. Money is specially desired for a free bed fund for those who have no friends or whose parents can partially meet the expense. There are between thirty and forty of this class who need immediate help. The purpose of the league, to stimulate "well and happy children to help the poor, sick and unhappy," appeals to every Christian heart. Leaflets giving full particulars may be obtained of the superintendent of the league, Mrs. Henrietta W. Dexter, 27 High Street, Springfield.

The distribution of flowers among the sick and poor has now become so general that it is desirable to know what species are best adapted to this purpose. The Flower Guild on Fifth Avenue, N. Y., publishes a helpful little pamphlet on the subject which gives directions, also, how to pack flowers to send by mail or express. Heliotrope and nasturtiums do not bear transportation well, but sweet pease, geraniums, verbenas, mignonette, asters and some other varieties stand this test finely.

The kindergarten rooms at the Elizabeth Peabody House in Boston were furnished by pupils and alumnæ of Miss Garland's and Weston's Normal Training School as a memorial to Miss Rebecca J. Weston, who died last August. It was through Miss Weston's untiring efforts that the first $1,000 was raised for the settlement. The mothers' meetings are well attended and plans for clubs for the older children are in progress. The library for these clubs is also furnished by the Weston Memorial Fund.

The worst of miseries
Is when a nature, framed for noblest things,
Condemns itself in youth to petty joys,
And, sore athirst for air, breathes scanty life
Gasping from out the shallows.

The Gist of It.

Alum costs between 3 and 4 cents a pound, but it is unwholesome.

Cream of tartar costs 25 cents a pound, but it is a fruit product and perfectly wholesome.

Cleveland's baking powder is made of pure cream of tartar; no alum, no ammonia, no tartaric acid, no phosphate, no adulteration of any sort.

That's why Cleveland's costs more to make than others; but it is worth more; it is wholesome and makes wholesome food.

The Conversation Corner.

MY DEAR CORNERERS: In a package in the Corner Drawer, labeled For Early Use, is this letter:

WEST FITCHBURG, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: In the Corner of March 5 is an inquiry for the first American poet. Anne (Dudley) Bradstreet was the first poetess, born in 1612, and wrote her best poem in 1650. Michael Wigglesworth was the first American poet and wrote his poem, The Day of Doom, in 1662. CARROLL C.

The time for the use of this letter, although not very "early," has certainly come now, for I have heard more about that first poetess the present week than I ever knew before in all my life. She lived in the town of Andover, which has just celebrated the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its incorporation. Andover is not far from Boston, and I was anxious to know more of that old mother-town of the Massachusetts Bay, which furnished the settlers of so many other towns in the early days and in the present century has educated so many men and women and sent them all over the world to do good with their education. I attended only a part of the exercises, but I saw and heard far more than I expected, and wished again and again that a few hundred of you Cornerers could have been there with me to study the history of our country—and doubtless of your own ancestors in many cases, for I was surprised to hear the orator speak out the name of a benefactor of the town, using the exact name of a Corner boy who was my guide at Concord the other day, while a portrait of the first Postmaster General of the United States showed me that two of our Newton members must be his descendants.

HOME OF ANNE BRADSTREET.

But as to Anne Bradstreet. The first thing I heard was a historical sermon—one of several, I understood, in the different churches—and almost the first sentence of the preacher was that "the spirit of educational Andover was incarnate in three persons," the first being Anne Bradstreet. When it came the anniversary orator's turn to depict—as he did in a masterly way—the founders of the town, he eulogized Anne Bradstreet. The poem that followed commemorated her too, and the poetess was referred to as "the literary successor of Anne Bradstreet." One of the banquet speakers, a Boston lawyer born in the Bradstreet house, had for his subject Governor Bradstreet, including, of course, his wife. Among the old houses whose pictures were shown in the stores and in the Loan Collection was

One, with long sloping roof
Where shadows come and go;
And close about whose door-stone gray
The early wild flowers blow,

A shrine for poet and for saint,
Where pilgrims never cease;
For grave Anne Bradstreet loved this haunt,
This haunt of ancient peace.

The house was three or four miles away, in what is now North Andover; I did not have time to visit it, but am able to show a picture of it. While, to confirm Carroll's letter, I have said so much about the first poetess of America—and will give you something more in the next column for your scrap-books—Anne Bradstreet was by no means the only historical attraction of the Andover anniversary. Many other things I looked at or listened to with your eyes and your ears. The children themselves had a notable part in the celebration, marching in the procession or halting in front of the ancient church to sing America and other patriotic songs. You remember that we have before had it in the Corner that Dr. Smith said that he wrote "America" in Andover, and I saw a tablet before a Main Street house, identifying the place where the young student scribbled the hasty verses, little thinking that sixty years after they would be sung by hundreds of happy children in the street and by a crowded audience in the old church of the town, and as well by millions of people all over the land. One thousand children had an entertainment all for themselves in the Town Hall, with songs and sleight-of-hand performances and all sorts of pleasant things. They saw also one evening a series of historical tableaux, which was repeated three times besides for grown-up people, showing how their forefathers lived and worked and fought. In one a boy was dropping corn in the field, one Indian capturing him and another slaying his older brother. I found afterwards that this was a true story, and saw a tablet on the old garrison house the thirteen-years old "Timothy Abbot" built and lived in after he was brought back from captivity by the kindness of an Indian squaw—and where, I was told, seven generations of his descendants have lived since, the boy who acted the part being of the last generation, and of about the same age as his very great-great-grandfather when captured—and his name is Ralph! Other tablets showed where James Otis died, where Moses Stuart and Harriet Beecher Stowe lived, the house where Oliver Wendell Holmes boarded as a schoolboy and the old academy where he spoke his exhibition ode.

In the "loan collection" hall I stumbled upon several Cornerers from other towns and wished many more could have seen the old-time portraits of good men and women, their quaint household furniture, their pewter platters, tin lanterns, spinning-wheels—with women at work beside them—Indian arrows and tomahawks, Revolutionary guns and swords, and relics of the Civil War brought home by the "boys in blue." It made history seem very real and vivid!

NEWTON CENTER, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: Will you please tell me what the "Boston Stone" is and where it can be found? EUGENE B., JR.

If you have a scrap-book you will find it fully described in the Corner of Aug. 8, 1889, and also referred to April 19, 1894. It is near the corner of Hanover and Union Streets; get your "senior" to show it to you some day, or call on me and I will. If you had been at the Andover celebration you would have seen standing outside the hall a similar stone rudely marked: TO C 21 M 1719. That meant that it was 21 miles to Charlestown in 1719. You see that all roads lead to Andover this week!

Mr. Martin

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

About Anne Bradstreet. She was the daughter of Thomas Dudley of Northampton, Eng., and the wife of Simon Bradstreet, both of them members of the "Massachusetts Company" which came to New England in 1630. They were with Governor Winthrop on the "Arbella," which made the passage from Southampton to Salem in two months and a half. Mr. Dudley was Governor of Massachusetts Bay Colony four times, and Mr. Bradstreet held the same office—under first and second charters—ten years, being eighty-nine years old in 1692 when he ceased to be governor. The Bradstreets went from Ipswich to Andover about 1643, and the poet died there in 1672, about sixty years old. Reared in the luxury of an English home, the hardships of pioneer life in the wilderness made her an invalid. Her poems and prose meditations show her beautiful Christian character. She had eight children, and her descendants are very numerous, including many well-known families of New England, and such men as Dr. Channing, Dr. Buckminster, R. H. Dana, O. W. Holmes, Wendell Phillips. Very likely some of you who read this column are her descendants too!

About Her Poems. They were first published in London in 1650, with the title of "The Tenth Muse, lately sprung up in America." Later editions were printed in Boston in 1678 and 1758. A complete edition of her works was published in Charlestown in 1867. Generous quotations may be found in Duyckinck's Cyclopedia of American Literature. She seemed to have a partiality for the number four, her longer poems having the titles: The Four Elements, The Four Humours in Man's Constitution, The Four Ages in Man, The Four Seasons of the Year, The Four Monarchies. Her poetry is not like Mrs. Hemans's or John G. Whittier's—you must not expect that! I quote a verse from the best of her poems, Contemplations:

Then on a stately Oak I cast mine Eye,
Whose ruffling top the Clouds seem'd to aspire:
How long since thou wast in thine Infancy?
Thy strength, and stature, more thy years admire,
Hath hundred winters passed since thou wast born?
Or thousand since thou brakest thy shell of horn,
If so, all these as nought, Eternity doth scorn.

LESSON FOR JUNE 14. Luke 23: 33-46.

JESUS CRUCIFIED.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D.D.

The crucifixion is the most sublime revelation of the heart of God. Without it the resurrection would be meaningless and the Christian religion lifeless. No one ever exhausts the study of it. The statement of the facts connected with it are the primary lessons of Christian faith. The inferences from these facts are the substance of Christian theology. The gospels present the facts of the crucifixion in their simplest form. Our attention in this lesson is directed to the facts as presented by Luke. These we group around:

I. The place. It was called Calvary. That is the Latin word for skull. Modern scholarship is now generally agreed that this place is about three hundred feet north of the Damascus gate and a short distance east of the high road. A branch road passes close by it. It is a mound in shape somewhat like a skull. It is also a cemetery and probably was used for that purpose at the time of the crucifixion. From its summit there is a view across the whole city. The Congregationalist's party stood on this mound one Sunday morning in April of last year and sang with strong emotions the hymn beginning,

> In the cross of Christ I glory,
> Towering o'er the wrecks of time.

II. The scene. It is easy to imagine three crosses facing the north and near the road. As Jesus hung on one of them between two crucified robbers, representatives of the different social classes passed by before his eyes. All alike viewed his sufferings with heartless indifference. "The people stood beholding." Often he had shown compassion on them as sheep without a shepherd. Now they looked on his agonies with no comprehension of their meaning, no movement to deliver, no sympathy with his suffering. But his dying was love giving life to save them.

"The rulers also scoffed at him." They knew his claims to be the Messiah. They remembered how he had proved his claims by healing the sick, casting out demons, raising the dead. But they valued their official position, of which they feared that his work would deprive them, more than they valued the higher life that he brought them. Therefore they were crucifying him because he sought to save them.

"The soldiers also mocked him." Familiarity with pain inflicted as punishment had made it a source of amusement to them. Royalty meant for them power to compel others to service and to protect one's self from attack and insult. So, as they saw the inscription above the head of the helpless sufferer, it seemed to them a huge joke, and they promoted it by offering the sour wine they were drinking as a festive cup to him who they thought was a pretended king.

Two robbers were crucified, one on either side of him. Their imbruted natures, in spite of their sufferings, experienced a grim pleasure in the soldiers' jests. They saw the people who passed by tossing their heads at Jesus with sneers and saying, "If thou be the Son of God come down from the cross." They heard the chief priests and scribes say, mockingly, "He saved others, himself he cannot save." And the two robbers caught the spirit of reviling and "cast the same in his teeth." One of them said, "If thou be the Christ, save thyself and us."

As the hours went by a strange darkness came brooding over the land and hushed with terror the mocking voices. Then, as the light broke forth again, and with a last strong, confident prayer to his Father, Jesus died; the Roman captain on guard, remembering the taunting cries he had heard from people, priest and soldier, gave his solemn testimony, "Truly this man was the Son of God."

III. Christ's spirit, as shown in Luke's record. Of the seven recorded utterances of Christ on the cross, three given in this gospel show:

1. Christ's spirit toward his enemies. "Father, forgive them," he prayed, "for they know not what they do." Jesus habitually contradicted the lesson which for centuries had been taught unchallenged in the Jewish church: "Thou shalt hate thine enemy." He declared that, without forgiveness of enemies, no one could receive forgiveness from God. But on the cross he endured the greatest test which can ever be put on any man. While he was suffering the most awful agonies to save men, they were heaping on him the most wanton insults that depraved ingenuity could invent. In return he breathed forth the supreme desire which then possessed him: "Father, forgive them." His eye rested on and his thought included all classes of enemies as he uttered this prayer, people, priests, soldiers and robbers. Henceforth no one could think of a limit to be placed before his will or his power to save. "Wherefore he also is able to save to the uttermost all them that draw near unto God through him."

2. Christ's spirit toward the penitent. One of the two crucified robbers, impressed by the spirit that could receive such treatment with only prayer in behalf of those who gave it, saw in that the evidence that Jesus was really a king. He confessed his sins and that he deserved death because of them: "We receive the due reward of our deeds." He acknowledged the holiness of Jesus: "This man hath done nothing amiss." He accepted him as his Lord, praying Jesus to remember him when he should assume his kingdom.

Jesus answered his petition, and we may be sure that his answer at such an hour would be such as an ignorant man in the agonies of death could not fail to understand. First, Jesus promised the penitent robber association with himself, "Thou shalt be with me." In this we learn what forgiving love means. All classes were mocking and reviling the dying Son of God, but as soon as one of them was touched by the majesty of the character that could forgive such wrong Jesus took him at once into fellowship. So he would have done to every one of that scoffing multitude. So he will do now to every penitent sinner. His word stands forever, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." Second, Jesus promised to the penitent man immediate entrance into conscious happiness: "Today shalt thou be with me in paradise." The natural inference is that whoever, seeing the character of Christ displayed in his sacrifice for lost men, shall acknowledge him as Saviour and Lord, and supremely desire fellowship with him, may at once enter into that fellowship and continue in it beyond death in conscious blessedness.

3. Christ's spirit toward his Father [v. 46]. The last utterance of Jesus proclaims his perfect trust in his Father and his perfect triumph. The clouds which had seemed to gather over him in the agony of suffering had now all disappeared. His sorrow was because of the world's sin which he had taken upon himself, but not because he had ever yielded to sin. Sin conquered temporarily his physical life but could not conquer himself. He died, not by the cross, but of a broken heart. Yet in dying he vanquished death by gaining the victory over sin which is death's sting. He embraced in his dying love the world of sinners and declared, in that act, his perfect union with God.

We may not be able to grasp the love which can embrace the whole world in sacrifice, we may not fully understand the relation of that sacrifice to the forgiveness with which God restores penitent sinners to his favor, but we can each appropriate the fact, feel the love, pour forth our gratitude and enjoy the fellowship of him who "when he had offered one sacrifice for sins forever sat down on the right hand of God," and now "ever liveth to make intercession for them that draw near unto God through him."

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

AMERICAN BOARD MISSIONS TO SAVAGE TRIBES.

(Parallel with The Congregationalist's July Topic for Missionary Meetings.)

The term "heathen" is no longer used in the highest class of missionary literature to characterize the unevangelized peoples of the earth. The picture which it calls up may be unjust to the highly-civilized old world nations, but no other word seems to apply so appropriately to the wild and primitive tribes of the Pacific Islands and of the Dark Continent. Their savage nature, degraded and bestial manner of life, gross religious conceptions are all indicated in the term heathenism. Nowhere has the triumph of the gospel been more marked than among the American Board missions to savage tribes, which have been, and still are, attended with enormous difficulties and threatened with constant perils. The romantic story of the Christianization of the Sandwich Islands is well known, but the history of other missions of this class undertaken by the Board, such as the Gaboon Mission in West Africa among the Guinea Negroes and the enterprise among the wild tribes of Sumatra and Borneo, is less familiar.

Of the present efforts of the American Board among primitive peoples none has a more interesting story than the Zulu Mission, which may be taken as a type of its African work. The Zulus are a branch of the Bantu or Kafir race, distinct from the Hottentot, but of kin to all the other tribes south of the Congo. They stand midway between the negro and the European type and are possessed of unusual mental and physical ability. In 1835 the American Board sent out two missionary expeditions, each consisting of three missionaries with their wives, who afterwards joined forces at Natal. These pioneers were Messrs. Lindley, Venable, Grout, Champion and Drs. Adam and Wilson. Dingane, the Zulu chief, received the missionaries in a friendly manner and schools were opened and a printing press set up. By 1842 two congregations had been gathered and the schools were in a flourishing condition, but the mission force was reduced to three men and three women, wars broke out and in view of these disasters the Prudential Committee recalled the missionaries. But the undaunted pioneers were unwilling to leave. With resolute purpose Dr. Adams said: "I will support myself by my profession till the dawn of a brighter day"; and Mr. Lindley said, "I will obtain a living by teaching the children of the Dutch Boers," while Mr. Grout started for America to plead for the continuance of the mission.

At Cape Town, however, he was intercepted by earnest remonstrance from Christians of various denominations, who called a public meeting and raised a fund to meet Mr. Grout's expenses while he should remain there and communicate by letter with the Board. More than this, the good lieutenant governor, Sir Peregrine Maitland, offered to adopt the three brethren as government missionaries, and sent Mr. Grout back to Natal, saying: "Go back, I will see that you do not lack support; I think more of missionaries than of soldiers to keep savages quiet." From that time the work went steadily forward. Congregations multiplied, churches were formed, comfortable buildings erected, kraal, station and boarding schools established. The entire Bible was published in the Zulu language in 1883. Among the educational institutions which do credit to the American Board and the Woman's Board are the Amanzimtote Seminary for boys, Inanda Seminary for girls, the Umzumbe and Ireland Homes, which are refuges for kraal girls escaping from heathenism, and the theological seminary at Amanzimtote. Natal may be considered as civilized, though there are sections where the old degrading heathenism is still seen. Wherever the gospel has been preached little Christianized communities have been formed, kraals have been replaced by houses, the people wear European clothing, and the ingenious Zulus quickly fall in line with civilization.

An interesting outgrowth of the Zulu work is the East Central African Mission, now located in Gazaland. This is really the foreign missionary enterprise of the Zulu Mission, established through the efforts of some of its missionaries and carried forward at its two stations, Mt. Silinda and Chikore, with the help of Zulu evangelists and teachers. Only a beginning has yet been made in this new field. The missionaries are still living in the temporary huts built after the native manner on their first arrival. Permanent houses, necessary to health if not to life, cannot be built for lack of funds, and our workers have encountered many hindrances which can be traced to the inadequate support from the churches. Still much has been accomplished in these three years since the mission was removed from the coast to the interior and recently the supply of missionaries has been re-enforced by Miss Gilson of the Woman's Board, who will open a station school.

As the East Central African Mission grew out of Zulu so, in a measure, the Micronesian Mission was the child of the mission to the Sandwich Islands. The Christian Hawaiians were willing to help carry the gospel to other needy islanders and the attention of the missionaries was turned to four groups of islands, 2,000 miles from Honolulu, known under the general name of Micronesia, or "Little Islands." They are divided into the Gilbert, Marshall, Caroline and Ladrone Islands and the work of the American Board, which began in 1852, is carried on among the inhabitants of the first three of these groups. The names of Snow, Gulick and Sturges, of Bingham, Doane and Pierson are connected with the pioneer efforts among these strange savages.

Dr. Dennis well says that the island world is "a wonderland of missions, a land of transformations, of romance, of heroism, of perils by land and by sea, of patient faith, of arduous toil, of noble sacrifices, of heroic martyrdoms, of unparalleled successes and gracious victories that must have rung through heaven." A proof of this is seen in the forty-eight churches, the twenty-eight native pastors, as well as thirty other native preachers and fifty-one native teachers, the eighty-two common schools now in Micronesia. Five of the island languages have been reduced to writing, the whole New Testament is now published in four of them and the Gilbert islands have the whole Bible. One of the chief stations is at Kusaie, an island in the western part of the Caroline group, where are training schools for the Marshall and Gilbert Islanders and a girls' boarding school under the care of the Woman's Board. The missionaries were expelled from Ponape, formerly an important center in the Caroline group, in 1890 by the Spanish Government, but Spain has been obliged to pay an indemnity for her treatment of them and renewed missionary activity is hoped for. Another important point is Ruk, from which work in ten islands of the Mortlock group is superintended.

As the climate and conditions of life on the Gilbert and Marshall Islands are unfavorable for American missionaries, a necessary feature of the Micronesian Mission is the use of mission vessels, which bring supplies, convey the workers from island to island, carry native helpers to new fields, collect scholars for the schools at Kusaie and make it possible for the missionaries to have a general superintendence of all the Christian communities. Besides the Morning Star, which is the means of communication with the outside world, the American Board owns two smaller vessels, the R. W. Logan for work in Ruk Archipelago and among the Mortlocks and the Hiram Bingham for use in the Gilbert Islands.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, June 14–20. What Think Ye of Christ? Matt. 16: 13–19.

In order to have this question strike us in a new light, suppose we detach for a moment the first word; then the query will read, "Think ye of Christ?" That puts the emphasis on the need and the desirability of making a definite effort day by day to think of Christ. Whether we are called by his name, or whether we make no profession of religion, we are in danger of letting absorbing duties and pleasures crowd one side the thought of Jesus. The saints in the middle ages used to make a practice of picturing to their imaginations a scene in the life of Christ, dwelling upon it so intently and tenderly that its reality and power grew upon them. Perhaps these mystics overdid the contemplative side of their religion, but in these rushing days we need sometimes to take ourselves in hand forcibly in order to give at least a few moments daily to honest, searching thought in reference to him who is so simple that a child can appreciate him, and so profound that a philosopher can never exhaust him.

They in particular who have never put forth time or mental exertion enough to enable them to form a clear opinion about Christ should give heed to this query. To have a definite estimate of Napoleon or Washington, to be able to speak positively about this or that great musician or artist, and not to have any decided view about Jesus Christ is a strange plight for an intelligent person.

Now place the emphasis on the word "Ye," or, to make it more direct, change the pronoun to the singular number. We must get our own thought of Christ. The world is full of books in which the thoughts of others about him are expressed in beautiful language. Raphael and Fra Angelico have put their thought of him into pictures that are the admiration of the world. Poets have sung their sweetest strains when their inspiration has been the thought of Christ. It is not so important that your thought of Christ should harmonize exactly with some one else's or with the accepted standard around you as it is that it shall be your own personal possession—something which you prize because you have wrought it out, something that occupies a high and solitary place like the thought of your mother, or the thought of your happy and innocent childhood, or the thought of the richest and most joyous experience of later years.

One thing more. Put your thought of Jesus to work. Hitch it to the disagreeable task, to the daily burden. Let it flavor your pleasures; let it penetrate every region of your life. Jesus did not demand of the early disciples that their thought of him should be absolutely complete or even entirely free from error. How can a mind just awake to the greatness of his character be expected to fathom it at once? The main thing is that one's thought of Jesus should be at once applied to life. After his confession Peter was immediately given to understand that he was to do something in the kingdom of heaven. Our thoughts of Jesus will be correct and valuable and sweet in proportion as we take them into our little world and apply them to its need and its problems.

BOOK REVIEWS.

RELIGIOUS LIFE AND THOUGHT.

The Empire of the Tsars and the Russians, Part III., The Religion, by Anatole Leroy-Beaulieu. Translated by L. A. Ragozin. This book is of special interest just now in connection with the coronation ceremonies at Moscow. It is written by an eminent French publicist, whose study of the Jews we reviewed not long ago. M. Leroy-Beaulieu has some of the marks of that curious Gallic narrowness which brings everything to the test of the boulevards, and which essentially, though never very seriously, affects the value of his judgments, but he is a broad-minded man for all that.

In this book, indeed, he traverses the political interest of Paris and decides all doubtful questions against the Russian ecclesiastical authorities, showing therein unconsciously how superficial is the bond of political interest which for the moment holds Russia and France together.

The subject of the book is considered in four parts. The first is introductory, treating of the universality of the religious feeling in Russia and of its origins and peculiarities in general. The second deals with the Russian Orthodox Church, the third with the schismatic parties related to that church, and the last with the alien confessions and the dissident sects, many of which have taken their suggestion from without. Under this head are considered also the Jews and Mohammedans, as well as the pagan creeds of the Asiatic empire.

It is altogether a strange picture of mediæval conditions, affected by extremely modern thoughts and tendencies, which Russia affords religiously as well as socially, and it is worthy of more serious study than American students of church history have given it—as if Europe of the age before Hildebrand, yet touched with Reformation influences, were set down for our investigation. It is a brilliant introduction to the matter which this book gives, and we hope it may lead to further research and comparison. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3 00 ]

The Religious Forces of the United States enumerated, classified and described on the basis of the Government census of 1890, by H. K. Carroll, LL.D. Dr. Carroll was in charge of the division of churches for the eleventh census and his title accurately describes what he has attempted in this contribution to the American Church History Series. He has supplied an introduction explanatory of the condition and character of American Christianity and revised the statistics so as to bring them down to date. The result is a most intelligent and useful hand-book, which should be in the possession of every student of American church life. [Christian Literature Co. $3.00.]

Tendencies in German Thought, by Rev. J. H. W. Stuckenberg, D.D. These lectures were delivered at different American colleges and divinity schools. Their author's position in Berlin gives him unusual facilities for acquaintance with his theme and his book will be of value to those who wish to study the tendencies and results of recent German thought. Most of the book is held close to the development and relations of the schools of philosophical theology, but goes on to the discussion and description of life and the last chapter is given to a consideration of the purpose and method of the scholar and thinker considered generally. [Hartford: Student Publishing Co. $1.00.]

AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL.

A Few Memories is the modest title of the superbly bound and illustrated volume in which Mary Anderson (Madame de Navarro) chronicles her experiences from early childhood until her marriage five years ago. The book is written primarily for young girls who have, or think they have, an aptitude for acting, and the author faithfully portrays the thorny pathway which leads to success. For the general reader the charm of these Memories lies in graceful narration of interviews with eminent persons like Lowell, Longfellow, Tennyson, Gladstone, Grant, Dom Pedro and many others whose names are familiar on both continents. In view of Wilson Barrett's noble attempt to present to theater-goers a thoroughly religious drama, in his Sign of the Cross now being played in London, it is interesting to note the sentiments which are expressed on the subject of immoral plays on pages 83-4. Joseph Jefferson, for instance, says: "What I could not invite my friends to hear and see in my own parlor I would not feel at liberty to put before my friends in the theater." Lowell refused to see a world-renowned play by a celebrated actress, giving as his reason, "I refuse to have my mind dragged in the gutter," and Tennyson declaimed with equal emphasis against what he called the "degradation of the drama." A beautiful portrait of Madame de Navarro from the famous painting by G. F. Watts forms the frontispiece. [Harper & Bros. $2.50.]

Memoirs of Barras, Vols. III. and IV. These beautifully printed and illustrated books complete the work which we reviewed on the appearance of the earlier volumes nearly a year ago. In spite of the manifest prejudice and conceit of Barras, his word must count in the final summing up of the evidence for the story of the French Revolution and empire. The editor's work, however, must have been difficult to a man who had the hearty contempt for his subject which M. Duruy shows for Barras, but it is done conscientiously and well. Altogether it is a brilliant picture of a striking period from a central point of view, if not from a just or agreeable onlooker. [Harper & Brothers. 2 vols. Each $3.75.]

Extraordinary Cases, by Henry Lauren Clinton. This is an autobiographical book by a New York lawyer, in which he describes some of the cases which he either watched or participated in as counsel. The law was less specialized in the days he describes, and some of the men with whom he associated were of national reputation. Many of the trials were criminal cases, and we can hardly see how Mr. Clinton can regard his successful advocacy of some of the criminals for whom he procured acquittal with much satisfaction. Except for this tendency to take a lower view of the function of an advocate than we approve, we have found the book very readable and it will be valuable as a source of material for history. [Harper & Brothers. $2.50.]

POETRY.

Aucassin and Nicolette: A Song-Tale of True Lovers. Translated into English by M. S. Henry from the little varying Old French texts of H. Suchier, etc., the verse translation rhymed by Edward W. Thomson. This is a leaf out of that middle age romance—a "song-tale" of the troubadours. From that far-away time with its unfamiliar thoughts of the world and of religion, it brings us a picture of human life which is as delightful as it is naïve. Aside from its interest as a picture of the human mind at a famous epoch, it has all the charm of youth and joy and love. It lets us into the heart of the time among the gay circles of Provence as completely as the Song of Solomon lets us into the Hebrew thought of love at the time when it was written. Mr. Thomson has succeeded admirably by abandoning imitation of the old verse form in reproducing its spirit in quaint and easy English rhymes. Altogether the book will be a treasure to lovers of poetry, and all the more that its form is admirably in accord with its matter. [Copeland & Day. 75 cents.]

Lyrics of Earth, by Archibald Lampman. Here is a book of verse in which humanity appears dim and shadowy as the remembered world at night, and the poet goes out alone to commune with nature. This love of the earth, of our own American earth with its native children and its individual moods and atmosphere, is one of the hopeful signs of the time among our younger poets, and Mr. Lampman's devotion to it is very interesting. It is a meditative work founded on close and loving observation of beauty, but it needs more of the trumpet and less of the flute to raise it to the level of the great masters of poetry. [Copeland & Day. $1.00.]

Sunshine and Shadow, by Caroline Edwards Prentiss, is a volume of verse beautifully printed on deckel-edge paper, and bound in full ooze calf, gilt top. We regret that we cannot praise the verse as we would like. It is not strong enough in thought to carry its infelicities of rhyme and meter. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.]

STORIES.

Madelon, a novel by Mary E. Wilkins. This is a story in which some great results are achieved in spite of a bad method and a manner that is often provoking in its lack of feeling for simplicity and good English. If the reader can overlook these false notes, and can accept two or three of the characters as possible within the limits of humanity (which, however, they are not) he will be carried on to the end in enjoyment of the intensity and subtlety of the book. Even Madelon herself, when we come to renew her acquaintance in a second reading, does not always belong to this world of ours, but she is imagined with great power and depicted with rare skill (except when the search for intensity leads to affected or slipshod writing). The contrasts of the book are extremely interesting, but the best might have been told in briefer space. Lot Gordon, for example, might have been credible if there had not been so much of him. In spite of all the faults of the book we come back to its central character with great pleasure, for her passionate strength and real, though unconventional and untutored, dignity, and the moral purpose of the book, which is to show that "love is the crown and the crucifixion of life, and proves thereby its own divinity," is clear from cover to cover. But in all the accessories of story writing Miss Wilkins has done better work than this. [Harper & Bros. $1.25.]

At Wellesley, Legenda for 1896, published for the Senior Class of Wellesley College.

The college atmosphere is very well preserved in these bright stories, which are all written by members of the present Wellesley Senior Class. The verse, jolly as it is, is much below the level of the prose, some of which is astonishingly mature in style and original in its outlook on life. Humor, dignity and breezy joy of young living go hand in hand with just enough pathos to make the stories strong. An Experiment, The Claim of the Heathen and A Committee of Entertainment are particularly illuminative of the conditions of life which make the college so attractive. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.00.]

The Baritone's Parish, or "All Things to All Men," by James M. Ludlow. Our readers need no introduction to this graphic story which first appeared in The Congregationalist. We are glad, as many of our readers will be, to have it in book form in a tasteful binding. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 30 cents.]

Another volume in the Ivory series is a reprint of Madame Delphine, one of George W. Cable's pathetic Creole stories. [Charles Scribner's Sons. 75 cents.]

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

Froebel's Occupations is the second of the three volumes comprising The Republic of Childhood, by Kate Douglas Wiggin and Nora Archibald Smith. It gives a clear and intelligent statement of the different methods of kindergarten employment, with the reasons for their selection, emphasizing always that their object is to give the child opportunity for the expression of his inner life. The thoroughness of the book is refreshing, and would be most useful to those half-trained kindergartners who have failed to comprehend the system in its entirety. This series of books is just what has long been needed, and ought to be in the hands of all who are trying to instruct children in the methods first developed by Froebel. [Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.00.]

Talks to the King's Children, by Sylvanus Stall, D. D., is the second series of object sermons to children, preached first to his own congregation in Baltimore. By means of a single familiar object he illustrates some spiritual truth in a delightfully reverent and impressive manner. Dr. Stall has few equals in this particular line of writing, and he shows a fine reserve in not allowing the object used to overshadow the truth taught. [Funk & Wagnalls Co. $1.00.]

A beautifully printed and illustrated book is Fairy Tales, by Mabel Fuller Blodgett, with pictures by Ethel Reed. The stories were told by a mother to her children and, having satisfied that exacting audience, are offered to the children of other mothers. Beginning with Prince Peppermint and Princess Sarsaparilla, an interesting company of imagined beings flits through its broad pages. The pictures are poster-like and very effective. [Lamson, Wolffe & Co. $2.00.]

We have two editions for school use of Southey's Life of Nelson. One is edited with an introduction and notes by Albert F. Blaisdell. The introduction is a well-written sketch of the history of the book, and the text is judiciously abridged and well printed. [Ginn & Co. 50 cents.] The other is prefaced by a brief, anonymous introduction and is unabridged. It was a good thought to append Campbell's Battle of the Baltic and Hemans's Casabianca, that children might get them in their true historical relations. [American Book Co. 40 cents.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Question of Copyright, comprising the text of the copyright law of the United States, a summary of the copyright laws at present in force in the chief countries of the world, etc. Compiled by George Haven Putnam. This is a second and carefully revised edition of a book which is indispensable in its department, and all the more because the question of copyright is still so much under agitation. Its historical matter also brings together the records of the struggle which ended in the enactment of the present law. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.75.]

If one wishes a sort of poetic guide-book through certain parts of England he will find Alice Brown's By Oak and Thorn a delightful vade mecum. The eleven essays which comprise the book picture with almost photographic fidelity the gray wastes of Lincolnshire, the warm luxuriance of Devonshire, the "gloriously mediæval and frankly dirty Warwick," the romance of the Doone country, the frowning gloom which envelops the home of the Brontés and the peculiar characteristics of several other localities. The exquisite literary style of these essays adds to their charm. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25.]

What They Say in New England is a very comprehensive collection of the signs, sayings and superstitions current among successive generations of New Englanders. The compiler, Clifton Johnson, has classified them conveniently, and has included also Counting Out Rhymes used in games, as well as some old stories, songs and nursery tales. To the New England born, as well as to all interested in folk lore, this tastefully bound volume cannot fail to be of interest. [Lee & Shepard. $1.25.]

NOTES.

—— Philip J. Bailey, the author of Festus, celebrated his eightieth birthday on April 22.

—— It is now officially denied that there is any danger of the discontinuance of the New English Dictionary.

—— The Americans, especially Sargent and Abbey, seem to have carried off the honors at the English picture exhibitions this year.

—— For fifty years Mr. Gladstone and Punch lived side by side in England and now they are about to publish a life of "The Grand Old Man" in pictures taken from his comic contemporary.

—— The London correspondent of the New York Tribune says that the English book market has not been so dull for many years as it is at present, and that hardly any notable books of the first rank are to be expected this year.

—— The widow of John S. C. Abbott, the friend and teacher of the boys of a past generation, has just died. It is said that many of the fifty-four books which Dr. Abbott wrote were transcribed and indexed by her with her own hand.

—— The Bookman vouches for the following as a correct stenographic report of part of a lecture delivered in the department of English literature at Harvard University. "We abstain," it adds, "from spoiling its literary and psychological effect by writing even a single word of comment."

Personally I do not like Spenser, and Milton is to me excessively unpleasant; Milton is trying to be a Puritan and an artist at the same time, and the two things do not and cannot coincide. A conscious moral purpose ruins any effort for artistic effect. To my thinking Comus isn't in it with the Faithful Shepherdess. A fellow like Milton, that has bored me with Paradise Lost and Samson Agonistes, I have absolutely no use for. When I read Milton, as I have to, I read him for study, not for enjoyment. I feel that Milton is rhetoric, just as Spenser is rhetoric. Take L'Allegro, Comus, etc.; these are rhetoric—jolly good rhetoric some parts of them. I should guess that Lycidas and some few of Milton's sonnets were some of the most spontaneous things he ever did. He certainly wasn't spontaneous in Samson Agonistes, although he spoke out with a certain resonant bang. No one can be spontaneous who constructs a Greek tragedy on the plan of a Hebrew story.

The compositor, whose suggestions we often find of value, is incredulous and suggests the name of another university whose name begins with H, but it is Harvard.

CLARA BARTON REACHING THE ARMENIAN SUFFERERS.

A LETTER FROM THE RED CROSS LEADER.

We are fortunate in being able to give to our readers a letter of so recent a date from one in whose heroic mission all Christendom is at present intent. Addressed to a personal friend, who is a member of our own staff, it is gladly shared with the general public.

CONSTANTINOPLE, MAY 10.

We send tomorrow five good, skillful Greek physicians to re-enforce the corps of Dr. Ira Harris, who is bravely fighting a four-headed demon of contagion at Zeitoun and Marash. Dr. Hubbell has just taken another detachment of men with one true woman out from Harpoot to Arabkir to meet the epidemics that have commenced to break out furiously there. It is very difficult to find physicians to go into the "interior." No one can wonder at this, with the most mixed and deadly of epidemics raging unchecked added to the memory of horrors yet fresh in every mind. Still effort, persuasion and money does find and obtain them, and our hope is that by the aid of medicines, disinfecting appliances, nutritious food and such delicacies as we can get to them that at length they bring this scourge to an end, and by the help of the seed, farming and artisans' utensils which we are getting to them with all possible haste, to get once more among these wretched people, in some sections at least, some gleams of hope and some means of self-sustenance; otherwise their very existence is a mere matter of time, and that not long.

The "obstructions" from the government, so generally predicted and persistently maintained by our anxious friends at the commencement of the undertaking, have not been realized. The alleged "direction of distributions" was an unfortunate and costly myth, but, in the place of these, all protection and assistance that have been asked for the furtherance of our work have been courteously and promptly granted. Our men go freely through the country, requiring protection only from the surrounding tribes of various nationalities, still excited and fired with the desire for plunder, of which they have had so rich a taste. These privileges are hailed by us all as the hopeful harbinger of better days for this distressed and persecuted people and the grand, heroic-souled men and women who have so long labored and so faithfully suffered with them. The problem is vast and, to our short vision, the outlook impenetrable, but to the Infinite the way is plain, the path clear and the great purpose is being accomplished. CLARA BARTON.

HOW CHRIST PREACHED.

The way Christ preached, rather than what he preached, was the subject of the paper presented at the Boston Ministers' Meeting last Monday by Rev. G. W. Christie. Christ's words, though twice translated, have never lost their intrinsic beauty. They are still the model of human wisdom and spiritual power and seem to lack only accentuation to render them vocal. Our Lord's words still live and fall upon the weary waste of this world like music, like soft rain, like dew. There is nothing local or provincial in Christ's speech. His ideal audience is humanity at large, and one way he reaches souls is through the simplicity of his teaching.

Mr. Christie referred to the aptness of Christ's illustrations, to the pathos of his appeals, to the moral grandeur and majesty in what he says, and to the authority and boldness of his words, giving many quotations to illustrate these different qualities. Christ preached the truth faithfully and fearlessly. No modern or mediæval preacher has ever given such a fearful picture of the final condition of the lost as did the Son of God, and yet these truths are told with quietness and earnestness, not with denunciations or anger. In closing Mr. Christie dwelt upon the tenderness and love which illumined all Christ's utterances.

"THE CONGREGATIONALIST'S" PILGRIMS.

It will be a widely representative company that will sail for England on the Columbia, June 4, as the members of The Congregationalist's English pilgrimage. In the first place a national character is given to the party by the fact that ten States are represented in its membership. Naturally New England furnishes the largest proportion, there being several representatives from each of the four States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut, the old Bay State being in the van, as would be expected, since the party was organized in Boston. New York State furnishes half a dozen pilgrims; others are from Pennsylvania, Illinois, Iowa, Arkansas and California.

There is also a good variety in the vocations of the different Pilgrims. Such a trip as has been planned appeals, of course, particularly to ministers and students, but professional and business men generally have also shown a desire to participate in it. The dozen or more ministers are nearly all pastors in active service, and it is noticeable that many of them have rendered exceptionally long service in their present fields. Their prospective rest and enjoyment will be all the more keenly relished because of the consciousness of having rendered to their people faithful and unwearying service for so many years. They in turn, in one or two cases at least, have facilitated the proposed trip by such substantial assistance as pastors well established in the affections of their flocks from time to time receive.

The clergymen of the party will not have it all their own way, by any means, for three business men, a lawyer, a general, a physician and a school teacher will introduce a considerable flavor of other callings.

Without attempting to particularize as respects the personnel of the party, there will be general interest in a word or two with reference to certain of its members. Rev. W. E. Park, D. D., bears a name honored on both sides of the sea. He is a son of the eminent theologian still living quietly at Andover, and possesses many of those strong and gracious qualities which are associated with his father. He has been pastor at Gloversville, N. Y., for the last twenty years, and in the State and national assemblies of our order as well as in many lines of public life he has taken a prominent and useful part. Another New York pastor, Rev. W. A. Robinson, D. D., of Middletown, is a direct descendant of that pioneer Congregationalist, John Robinson, and in his turn has found a large place of service and made an individual reputation. When a pastor in Vermont he was for three years on the State Board of Education, and he was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1870. He was president of the Home Missionary Board of New York State in 1884, and his twenty years' pastorate at Homer was as fruitful as it was exceptional.

Probably the oldest member of the delegation is Rev. Edward Robie of Greenland, N. H., still in the harness there, though it is forty-four years since he was installed. His tastes are scholarly, and a country parish has permitted him to cultivate them to such good purpose that Dartmouth College some time ago bestowed the honor of a Doctorate of Divinity upon him, which, however, he was so modest as to refuse, though subsequently persuaded to accept the honor.

Another New Hampshire minister is Rev. Cyrus Richardson, D. D., of Nashua, an excellent preacher and pastor, one of the pillars of Granite State Congregationalism and a trustee of Dartmouth College. Rev. W. W. Leete, though of Eastern origin and training, is one of the most popular and successful ministers in Illinois. Rev. L. L. Wirt has been for several years the efficient superintendent of the Sunday school interests of our denomination in California. Rev. Messrs. F. D. Sargent, R. P. Hibbard, E. K. Holden and Sherrod Soule have charge of important churches.

Hon. Jonathan A. Lane is a typical Boston merchant, representing in his birth, tastes, training and influence all that is best, and standing high in the commercial circles of the city, and of the nation as well. For many years he was president of the Boston Merchants Association. He has been active in politics and has exhibited an uncommon amount of public spirit in many directions. He is one of the leading members of Union Church.

Gen. Albert Wheeler, a graduate of West Point, has been inspector general upon the staff of three New Hampshire governors, one of whom once said: "If all military men who belong to the church were like General Wheeler the church would shine in the world." Dr. A. S. Wallace is the leading physician of Nashua and a patriotic and high-minded gentleman. Mr. C. H. Noyes, also from Nashua, is master of its high school. Mr. N. W. Littlefield is a prominent lawyer of Providence, R. I.

The ladies of the party are no less deserving of particular mention, but we will now allude only to Miss A. F. Burnham of Cambridge, who is the editor of the juvenile grade of lessons and Sunday school papers issued by the C. S. S. and P. S., and of which many hundreds of thousands are sold, and to Miss Dyer, the editor of the Home Department of The Congregationalist. Many of the gentlemen are accompanied by their wives, and the party includes a group of women prominent in Hartford social and religious circles.

The party has been made up carefully with the intention of securing a group of persons who would be congenial and would value especially the unusual privileges to be offered them. Most, if not all, of the pilgrims have pronounced Puritan and Congregational sympathies, and, without undervaluing the general pleasure inhering in such a trip as this, they look upon it as a means of education such as is not often available. They will doubtless find much pleasure in one another's society. They are certainly a delegation which will fitly represent American Congregationalism, and they will bring back from the shrines which they visit in England a larger understanding of historic Congregationalism, of its heroes of other years and its present day exponents.

CONGREGATIONAL BOARD OF PASTORAL SUPPLY.

We print below a substantial part of the second annual report of this organization presented by the secretary, Rev. C. B. Rice, D. D., at the recent meeting of the General Association in Fall River.

The business of our office is increasing. The gain is not rapid, but it is steady and it bids fair to be continuous and permanent.

During the year since the last meeting of the association we have rendered official service in matters connected with filling the pastoral office to 127 churches. This includes three pairs of churches joined together under one pastor, making the number of pastoral fields 124. We count only that which has been done in answer to requests from committees or authorized representatives of churches. The furnishing of occasional or temporary supplies is not included. There has been a great variety in the nature and extent of the service. In some cases it has consisted only in answering inquiries respecting particular men whose names were given to us. In other instances it has been desired that candidates should be sent or directly proposed from our office. A frequent method has been to lay before committees of churches a full account of information received or opinions gathered with regard to a considerable number of available men, and the committees have thus been enabled to form a judgment of their own as to the men who might be most likely to meet the requirements of the case.

It is not easy to state the exact number of pastoral settlements that should be credited to the work of our office. There were at least fifty in which we had an important share. Of these there were four-fifths that followed upon recommendations made directly and originally by us and which might thus be regarded as distinctively our own. Much the larger part of these settlements have been in Massachusetts. Our correspondence with churches has doubtless in some cases caused caution to be exercised as to the making of pastoral engagements —a thing never pleasant but sometimes needful.

Opportunities to preach as candidates for settlement have been furnished to one hundred and three men. Of these, seventy-six were residents of Massachusetts. With churches that have received their candidates from us, the average number of such candidates that have been heard before a settlement has been reached has been two and three-fifths. Sixteen churches have taken the first candidate sent. It is fair to say that several of these churches with whom the process was so quick were of the smaller churches, who might not regard their range of choice as wide. But they were by no means all of them of this description, and there were none with whom there might not have been a considerable range of selection. In general it is true that the service rendered by the board to the larger churches is not inconsiderable.

The financial report which we have to make is much less favorable than we could wish, though even in this there has been some gain from the preceding year. The receipts of the board have been from contributions by the churches, $1,411.74; from preaching by the secretary, $478.76; from registration and other office fees collected from without the State, $162 80.

The payments have been for rent of office, $150; postage, $101.65; telegraphing, $13.17; advertising, stationery and printing, $115.70; care of room incidentals, $23.30; traveling expenses of secretary, $81.07; salary of secretary's assistant, $416.64; salary of secretary in part, $1,168.19.

There is now due the secretary, $1,577.58. Much more than half of this deficiency existed at the close of the first financial year of the board, July 1, 1895. Since that time, although there has been a large falling behind, yet it has been at a less rapid rate than last year, and this notwithstanding the fact that individual contributions to a considerable amount were received last year, while during the present year there have been none such, and we have depended wholly upon the gifts of the churches.

Nearly half the churches in the State have made as yet no contribution. And while many have sent us their gifts for the second year that did not for the first, yet the deficiency occasioned by the lack of these gifts for the former year still continues. It was expected from the first that the difficulty in collecting money would prove one of the chief embarrassments of our work. The agency is new. Its necessity, or propriety, has been doubted by many. To raise money is a thing in its nature ordinarily not easy. The times have been hard. Other benevolent claims have been pressing. Small matters are easily forgotten or let pass as of no serious importance. We have been ourselves more concerned for the prosperity of the business than for the raising of the money needed to carry it on, and perhaps have not set forth the lack of funds with sufficient urgency. The secretary still lives, partly by faith, partly by works and partly, and in far too large a part, by the fading remembrances of works long past. While the churches are making use of the office so largely, according to the purpose of its appointment, no one can be in the least disheartened concerning its ultimate secure establishment. Yet the need of a much more abundant present support is in fact very great.

It should be said that several conferences, the Worcester North, the Berkshire South, the Norfolk and the Barnstable, make the needed collections from the churches through their own treasurers, which is very helpful to us. Others have recently voted to do it. Nearly all the churches of the Essex South Conference have contributed, and a good proportion in the Essex North and Andover conferences. The contributions have also been large, relatively, from the whole southeastern portion of the State.

The report goes on to exonerate pastors desirous of a change from the charge of blamable restlessness, and the churches generally as well from the charge of unkind treatment of their pastors. The hard times have been trying to even the most loyal members of the church, especially in country districts. The suggestion is made that the cost of moving would be greatly reduced if parsonages were furnished as is now the case, to some extent, among the Methodists. The greater cost of educating children today as compared with the past is pointed out as another trial to pastors.

The latter part of the report is an endeavor to make clear what the proper function of such a board is. It seeks first of all to serve the churches, but not to obtrude its advice; to gather information from a wide range of sources without personal bias, but to hold such information sacred and confidential; and to base its work on sound, general principles of action.

CHINA AS A MISSION FIELD.

THE HYDE LECTURES AT ANDOVER.

Rev. Henry Blodget, D. D., for forty years a missionary in China, concluded recently a course of lectures at Andover on the Hyde foundation, his subject being China as a Mission Field.

According to Dr. Blodget, the Flowery Kingdom offers certain marked advantages to missionary enterprise. The country is easy of access and one may now go freely into its remote interior, enjoying considerable facility of transportation; the climate is temperate and healthful; missionaries may live in Western style and command excellent banking service together with reliable mails; personal safety is practically assured; the whole country is under one government, Manchurian and not Chinese in its personnel; a common written language prevails throughout the empire, much the same being true of the spoken Mandarin; and the excellent moral maxims of the Chinese classics naturally serve as a schoolmaster to bring men to Christ.

On the other hand, serious difficulties present themselves. Three hundred and sixty-two million people are not to be quickly won from a faith they have held from remote antiquity and which is interwoven with the entire history of the nation, the language is extremely difficult and a system of civil service examinations, based upon the ancient pagan classics, makes pagans of all who aspire to official or professional distinction in the Celestial Empire.

After tracing in detail the career of the early Nestorian missions, from 505 A. D. to their disastrous end, Dr. Blodget showed that they deserved to fail, as did also the first Roman Catholic missions in China. They had not preached faithfully the cardinal truths of the gospel and had not given the people the Bible in their own tongue. This being true, there was little possibility of their securing permanent results in a remote and then all but inaccessible country whose people are by nature agnostic. The Nestorians were overwhelmed by the Mohammedans, while the Jesuits, who had gained their hold through flattery, craft and deceit, met with fearful persecutions that ceased only with the edict of toleration in 1844.

After discussing the controversies that have arisen out of the difficulty of finding in the Chinese language a suitable word for God, and expressing his own strong preference for Tien Chu, Dr. Blodget reviewed the history of Protestant missions in China from the departure of the Englishman, Robert Morrison, in 1807, to the present time.

"The present state of all the missions as compared with things in the earlier stages of the work is truly wonderful and should occasion devout thanksgiving to God. In 1833 there were three missionaries in Canton, and six missionaries to the Chinese in the Indian Archipelago; in 1896 there are 1,500 missionaries in China. In 1833 one of the missionaries wrote, 'The barbarians' place in the Celestial Empire is very strait and narrow, and they come into contact with few except foreigners'; in 1896 missionaries have the freedom of the empire. In 1833 foreign women were not allowed in Canton, the one port of trade; in 1896 the wives of missionaries and even unmarried missionary ladies are found in the remotest provinces. Missionary ladies have traveled for 1,000 miles on the Han River without European escort. In 1833 there was no public preaching of the gospel; in 1896 the good tidings are sounded out in all quarters, nowhere more freely than within a short distance of the palace of the emperor. In 1833 there was one ordained native preacher and seven native converts; in 1896 the number of native preachers cannot be less than 2,000, of whom more than 200 are ordained, and the number of converts is 50,000. In 1833 death was the penalty for teaching or receiving Christianity; in 1896 Christianity is a lawful religion of the empire, to be protected alike in those who teach and in those who embrace the doctrines.

"Instead of the one port of Canton in 1833, we have in 1896 thirty ports, which are, in fact, European colonies of greater or less proportions, planted on the seaboard, in the interior and in the outlying territories of China; and the powerful stimulus of Western civilization is by this means brought to bear in so many object lessons upon the Chinese mind. A new literature embodying the best thoughts of Christian Europe and America is springing up, and already is widely disseminated among the people. The Bible is translated into the general language both in its written and spoken forms, and into eight of the principal colloquial dialects. In 1889 there were more than 650,000 copies of the New Testament and portions of the same put into circulation. Several thousands of tracts and scientific treatises have been prepared by missionaries, beside which forty religious and thirty-six secular periodicals have been published."

The tenth and last lecture was a beautiful chapter in pastoral theology, showing what are the qualities of mind and heart that enable a man to build and sustain Christian faith in a pagan land. He must have a firm belief of his own if he is to cope with gigantic systems of error and to remain devoutly Christian while away from other Christians. He must not be too tolerant toward heathenism. He must be self-denying; loving, though his love is ill-requited; sufficiently shrewd not to fall a prey to designing knaves; patient in toil and under injustice, being always reluctant to appeal to civil authorities; kindly sympathetic to the poor, and uniformly courteous to all classes; and instead of yielding to the temptation to ridicule idolatry he must gently remove the tendrils of faith from the beloved image and twine them about the objects of Christian devotion. Through all he must be a man of prayer. R. L. H.

GLEANINGS FROM OUR MAIL BAG.

THE NEED OF BIBLE STUDY.

The brother who thought that Joseph the husband of Mary was the same person with Joseph the son of Jacob must be related to the good deacon who asked me once if Saul of Tarsus was Saul the king of Israel. Doubtless similar mistakes as far apart from the truth as the Josephs or Sauls were from each other might be discovered in Christian circles. Whatever theories may be held about the facts in the Bible, is there not room for more acquaintance with those facts themselves? Notwithstanding the wide spread of Scriptural studies, can it be truly said of many now grown up into life that from childhood they have "known the holy Scriptures?" Who is to blame for Bible ignorance? T. S. R.

A CALL FOR SURPLUS LITERATURE.

Without doubt many of the ministerial brethren in the East have old numbers of reviews, both religious and secular, for which they have little or no further use. A good many ministers in the West, especially in home missionary churches, are living on a salary which precludes the thought of subscription to such reviews as Homiletical, Bibliotheca Sacra, Treasury, Yale, Andover, Thinker, North American, Forum, Arena, etc. My salary has been $500, then $400, this year $800, with moving expenses and $200 debts of previous two years to make up. In this case I have not been able to buy a book in three years, and the only review I get is the Review of Reviews sent me by a relative. Is there not some way by which the volume of good literature that has served its end in Eastern parsonages may be turned Westward? I should be most happy to hear from a few brethren who have magazines of this class, and could doubtless arrange for a place in Boston where they could be sent and packed in a barrel for shipment.

PASSING COMMENT.

Recollections of The Congregationalist's tour last year are still benefiting the friends of the members of the Oriental party, at clubs as well as among the churches. After this summer many audiences will doubtless derive pleasure from a visit to the more northern countries of Europe with some of the forty or fifty members of the pilgrimage.

A New Hampshire pastor, who has afforded enlightenment and profit to those who wanted to be well-informed citizens, has realized a privilege which is within reach of the majority of pastors, but is not taken advantage of as freely as would be well. Let us set up a forum in our churches which shall be near the level of the pulpit.

Memorial Day has an added significance to a few churches which are mentioned as having observed the day in commemoration of the members who have died during the year. There have been faithful soldiers of the church whose memory should be renewed at least once annually.

Practical self-denial is illustrated in a Florida item this week. That the miseries of suffering ones so far away should be remembered on such a festive occasion is especially unusual.

Santa Monica, Cal., rejoices in the distinction of having a "Prohibition Congregational" church. We wonder if it stands alone in the denomination?

Such hopeful conditions for a new church in Rhode Island will be appreciated by many a church which has experienced the trials of building.

To the many other calls for aid comes a new cry from some of our cyclone-stricken churches in the West.

RHODE ISLAND CONFERENCE.

So grateful seemed every look upon the face of nature that Christian humanity could not grumble against the genial showers which greeted the delegates of the Rhode Island churches as they met at Westerly on Tuesday morning, May 26, for the annual two days' conference. The Pawcatuck Church, with Rev. E. L. Warren just settled as pastor, has the distinction of being the most westerly church in the conference bounds—so far west as to be outside of Rhode Island, just across the line from Westerly, and in Connecticut geographically. The State is so small and contains so much that is good, it is not to be wondered that it runs over into Connecticut and Massachusetts.

The conference organized by choosing Rev. S. H. Woodrow and Rev. D. T. Torrey as permanent moderator and scribe. Only two or three of the thirty-seven churches failed to be represented by either delegates or written reports. The revered and familiar face of Rev. Thomas Laurie, D. D., was missed for the first time at an annual meeting for more than twenty-five years. The conference passed a tender resolution of fraternal sympathy for him in his continued feebleness. The reports of the work were indicative of almost universal growth and prosperity, increase of members, payment of debts, necessity of improved and enlarged plants and only one church without a pastor—all tidings showing a bright year of church life. The accepted program announced as special topics: What Should Be the Attitude of the Church Toward Moral Reforms, opened by Rev. J. C. Alvord, and What Ought the Church to Do for Its Young People, introduced by Rev. F. B. Pullan. Both subjects awakened interesting discussion. The sermon by Rev. Wallace Nutting, D. D., on Sunday evening was a fine treatment of the theme, The Sanctity of Common Things, from Acts 10: 15.

The Rhode Island Congregational Historical Society had an hour, which was chiefly occupied with a historical address by Prof. Williston Walker, D. D., upon Some Contributions of Congregationalism to American Civil Institutions. The State Home Missionary Society held its meeting as a usual part of the program. The denominational sccieties were given the morning session on Wednesday, and their faithful representatives, chancing to be three of each sex, were heard with keen interest—Dr. Daniels for the American Board, Dr. Choate for the Home Missionary Society, Rev. G. A. Hood for the Church Building Society, Miss D. E. Emerson for the American Missionary Association, Mrs. H. N. Lothrop for the Woman's Board and Mrs. H. E. Brown for the Woman's Home Missionary Association. The Sunday School Society was given a little time on the previous day because of the presence of Supt. F. J. Marsh of Boston and Rev. R. A. Rowley of Oregon.

The sessions all through were full of interest, and the natural attractions of Westerly and its neighboring seaside resort, Watch Hill, were able to entice very few from the constancy which becomes a true delegate in devotion to the program of meetings. True, it was early in the season and the big hotels at Watch Hill were not open and the electric cars to the shore were not running on summer schedule. But Westerly was beautiful and Watch Hill was winsome in its prospective summer attractions. The conference was a larger success than usual. F. B. P.

THE ASSOCIATION OF PENNSYLVANIA.

The beautiful village of Ridgway, on a shoulder of the Alleghanies, welcomed the Pennsylvania Congregationalists, May 26, and entertained them royally. The fine, commodious meeting house, the pretty parsonage, the cordial words of the pastor, Rev. J. I. Upton, who has been for five years the wise and successful leader of that flock, and the devoted attentions of his warm-hearted people won the admiration of all the visitors.

The association had returned to its birthplace, for it was in Ridgway, ten years ago, that it began to be. It may seem strange that it is so young a bantling, when Congregationalism lacks only a year of being 100 years old in the State. The association goes next year to Ebensburg, perched on a mount of vision near Cresson, to help that church celebrate its centennial. But of the existing churches only four others were organized before 1830. The growth has been slow and the churches were widely scattered. Many of them were Welsh and clung with great fondness to their mother tongue. It was only in recent years that they discovered, with alarm, that they would lose all their young people and their churches would become extinct unless they introduced English into their services. A wise change has been rapidly going on, so that English is now frequently heard in all the churches and is the exclusive language used in most of them.

A remarkable growth has also set in of late. Sixty-four of the present 111 churches have been added since 1870, and forty-two within the last ten years. In the eight years since Superintendent Jones began his work here more English-speaking churches have been organized than in all the previous history of the State. It was with commendable pride in its recent history, therefore, and with much courage and hope for the future that the messengers of the churches gathered at this meeting.

Having made Rev. Thomas Bell moderator, the brethren soon found that the pastor and his committee had prepared a feast of good things in the program. The annual sermon, by Rev. C. A. Jones, admirably set forth the characteristics of The Kingdom of God, and was fittingly followed by the communion service. The preacher of the evening also read an interesting historical paper the next morning on Ten Years of State Association Life, setting forth the progress of the decade.

A succession of able and interesting papers and addresses filled two delightful days. Rev. D. L. Davis, the only pastor present who had assisted in organizing the association, gave a paper of great wisdom and force on The Relation of Churches and Pastors to Political Reform. Rev. H. M. Bowden, who presided at most of the sessions as assistant moderator, owing to a slight inability of the moderator, read a scholarly and judicious paper on The Effect of the Scientific Study of the Bible upon Christian Doctrine and Faith. While showing evident sympathy with modern historic methods of research, and recognizing certain changes of view which they compel, he affirmed that they do not destroy a single fundamental truth, and will be found to be a great aid to faith in the end. The Social Elements of Christianity were set forth in a strong and finished address by Rev. R. R. Davies, showing that Christ's work was not a mere forensic adjustment of the relation of individuals to God, but aimed at the transformation of society. Rev. W. L. Evans gave a well-considered paper on The Union of Thought and Action in Christianity, blending the theoretical and practical with excellent judgment. Rev. C. H. Richards, D. D., pointed out a premillennial necessity in an address on The Reunion of Christendom.

Our missionary work received due attention, and here the "wise-hearted women" lent much to the interest of the meeting. Rev. W. S. Hawkes of Utah gave a graphic picture of work among the "exceptional populations" of Arizona and New Mexico, and Miss M. W. Leitch, in one of her magnetic speeches, roused enthusiasm for foreign missions to a white heat. Dr. T. W. Jones gave an inspiring account of a year's work in the Keystone State. Our national societies were eloquently presented, Dr. L. H. Cobb speaking of The Meeting House and the Millennium; Rev. W. S. Hawkes speaking of Home Missions; Rev. H. B. Miller, a Fisk graduate, speaking for the American Missionary Association; Dr. W. A. Duncan rousing fresh interest in the Sunday School Society; and Dr. N. H. Whittlesey thrilling all with the story of The Wounded Soldiers of the Lord's Army. C. H. R.

THE IOWA ASSOCIATION.

Weatherwise, May 19–22, the days of the meeting furnished a good deal of variety, but for the most part the skies were propitious. The hospitality of the Davenport Edwards Church, our host, knew "no variableness neither shadow of turning," albeit there was profuse variety in the provisions for our entertainment. The wife of a home missionary gave the experience of the guests generally when she said, "It was a series of surprises."

Davenport, "beautiful for situation," on the banks of the Mississippi, adorned with elegant homes, lovely parks and gardens, and groves of native oak where the birds sing and the squirrels play unmolested, is one of our large cities, though the population is only 32,000, for Iowa is a rural State. To Congregationalism Davenport is historic ground. For many years this was the home of Rev. J. A. Reed, who came here in 1840, and was for eighteen years agent of the H. M. S. in the State. His grave is here where his kindred dwell. His daughter is the wife of the son of the man who taught America to sing My Country, 'Tis of Thee. John C. Holbrook, now a cherished name the country over, was living here when he was picked up and set to preaching. Here Oliver Emerson, organizing the church in 1839, was pastor for a few months, and here in succession, in the early times, ministered A. B. Hitchcock, Ephraim Adams and G. F. Magoun. Here, also, Iowa College was born.

Davenport being on our eastern State borders, the attendance, about 250, was hardly up to the average. The distance from Davenport to the northwest corner of the State is, by the shortest route, 385 miles.

The program was prepared with unusual care, the pastor of the church, Rev. G. S. Rollins, being the chairman of the committee. It was intended to call attention to the vital characteristics of our denomination on the one hand and on the other to bring to the front the activities of the church. Three words guided the committee in the choice of topics and speakers: Polity, Ministry and Mission.

Discussing our polity, Dr. M. A. Bullock had a paper on Permanence and Influence of Congregationalism, in which he said the elements of permanence in influence are to be found in the autonomy of the church, the fellowship of the churches, educational influence and the influence of the missionary spirit; and Rev. E. M. Vittum found the gist of the matter in his topic, Distinctive Ideas of Congregationalism, in the memorable words of Lincoln: "Of the people, by the people, and for the people."

Treating the topics relating to our ministry, Prof. Charles Noble of Iowa College, in a paper entitled Strength and Beauty, pleaded for a more thoroughly educated ministry; Mr. W. H. Richards made the same plea substantially in his paper on Preaching for the Times; and Prof. W. D. McKenzie gave a grand address, clearly intellectual and deeply spiritual, on The Authority of the Christian Teacher. He captured the association.

The answer to the question What Is the Mission of Our Churches? came in many reports, addresses, papers and resolutions. Rev. R. W. Jamison spoke from experience on Reaching the Masses. Rev. W. L. Byers gave a strong paper on The Church and the Municipality, in which he said the church should know the town, feel responsibility for its government, utter protests against civic abuses and misrule, demand enforcement of law, be non-partisan in local politics, in line with every public improvement, and insist that the gospel is applicable to all civic affairs, join hands with all good forces and be itself a positive spiritual force. Rev. C. P. Boardman spoke of the Higher Evangelism, which he believes to be socialistic. Rev. J. M. Hulbert's spicy paper on Congregational Fellowship in Iowa, declaring it to be nothing unless Christian and practical, was in answer to the question What Is the Mission of Our Churches?

The meeting of the Iowa Home Missionary Society, Thursday afternoon, brought out reports showing $18,065 raised and expended, ninety-eight missionaries employed and ten churches organized. In the same line was the grand jubilee meeting of the A. M. A., in which Dr. Roy was strongly re-enforced by a colored pastor, a teacher from an Indian school, and a representative of the mountain whites. The same question as above was again answered in the addresses of Secretary Herrick and Miss Wilson of Utah, and in those of Secretaries Boynton, Taintor and Hitchcock, and in the fervid appeal of Missionary Bissell from India. It was the unanimous verdict that missionary causes never had a better presentation in Iowa, and it was the feeling of the secretaries that they never had a more sympathetic hearing

Rev. S. F. Millikan was moderator and filled his place admirably. The fellowship of the saints was delightful. There was not a note of discord anywhere. The devotional hours were the best of all. Rev. C. C. Harrah preached the sermon from the text: "After the way which they call a sect, so serve ye the God of our fathers." Algona, up toward the northwestern corner of the State, is to be the next place of meeting. T. O. D.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

Park Street.—We stated in our issue of May 14 that the recent action of the church, whether regular or irregular, would doubtless draw from Rev. I. J. Lansing a statement of his position. Such a statement appeared in the Boston papers last week in the form of a reply to the communication of a special committee of the church. He questions the legitimacy of the proceedings of the church, takes occasion to refer to what he considers the illegal action of the society at the annual meeting as in his opinion a breach of contract, asserts that he had always avowed himself ready to bear a generous share of any financial deficit, and while declining to accede to the request of this committee declares that he reserves to himself the future consideration of what may be required by his own sense of duty to this church and of the honor due to the Master.

Massachusetts.

CAMBRIDGE.—Prospect Street. Rev D. N. Beach, who has been a guest of the city of late, in connection with the 50th anniversary of the city, occupied his old pulpit, morning and evening, last Sunday. The auditorium was crowded and his review of Cambridge history and his forecast of the future were inspiring.

WINTHROP.—On May 27 a new church was organized and recognized at Tewksbury Chapel by a council representing 23 churches. Services have been held there for six months, and the support of the new organization seems assured. At the evening service Rev. Joshua Coit, the moderator, received the new members, numbering 21, and Rev. F. J. Marsh offered the prayer. Rev. C. E. Jefferson and Rev. C. W. Blackett gave a welcome from the Congregational and local churches respectively. Dr. Alexander McKenzie also gave an address. The new organization will be known as Union Church. The enterprise was started by Rev. E. J. Moore, and has been carried on by Mr. Arthur Truslow of Andover Seminary. There is no other Congregational church in the town. The chapel is leased free of rent.

BEDFORD.—The benevolent contributions the past year were the largest in the history of the church—$1,156. Ten persons have united with the church. Three of the oldest members, one of them a daughter of the first pastor, Rev. Samuel Stearns, recently died within one week. Rev. Edwin Smith is pastor.

LOWELL.—The women of the various churches are earnestly seeking to increase the missionary interest. Three of the pastors' wives, Mrs. Johnson, Mrs. Leland and Mrs. Merriam, have each opened their houses for women's missionary meetings, which have proved of special interest from the social element thus added.

AMESBURY.—Main Street. The first communion table ever used in this town is a valued treasure of this church, to which it has been presented recently.

HAMILTON.—The gospel services of late have been well attended, and were conducted at five different points. The churches have been stirred and about 100 persons have begun a new life. Others have been renewed in their interest.

WELLESLEY.—First. The council which met last week Tuesday to consider the resignation of the pastor, Rev. L. W. Hicks, agreed with the action of the church in its acceptance of the resignation, to take effect last Monday. Mr. Hicks's health made a reconsideration of his action impossible, notwithstanding the urgent unanimous request of the church to that effect. During the pastorate of nearly five years the church has been happily united. It now has a fund of $5,000 for church extension, which was largely collected through the efforts of the pastor. Mr. Hicks will not resume pastoral work at present, but will make his home with an aged relative in Hartford, Ct.

WAREHAM.—First held special memorial services May 24, to which were invited three military companies. A large and attentive congregation heard a sermon by the pastor, Rev. J. H. Yeoman, and an original hymn was sung. The Congregationalist service for Memorial Sunday was used with acceptance in the evening.

DUDLEY.—The present membership of the church is 75. The Sunday school is doing good, faithful work, and the Endeavor Society is one of the most aggressive in the State. No special revival services have been held, but the church has steadily grown in activity and helpfulness. Dr. W. E. Morse is the present pastor.

OAKHAM.—This church contributed for benevolence last year $81. The present membership is 115. The Y. P. S. C. E. and Sunday school are flourishing. The Sunday evening service is varied by preaching or a social service.

Goodspeed's subject was American History a Record of God's Providence.——South. Mrs. Ballington Booth spoke at this church last Sunday evening. The auditorium was taxed to its utmost capacity. The service last Sunday evening related to those who have died the past year.—Eastern Avenue. The first memorial service ever held in this church occurred last Sunday evening. Deceased members of the Sunday school and church were eulogized briefly.

GREAT BARRINGTON.—First. The installing exercises of the new pastor, Rev. L. D. Bliss, attracted a large attendance last week Wednesday. The candidate read a carefully prepared paper which left little room for questions. Mr. Bliss was ordained in 1889, and has previously served in a pastorate at Woodland, Cal. The church with which he is now connected has celebrated its 150th anniversary and has valuable property, including a beautiful church edifice, chapel and manse.

Maine.

GARLAND.—The church is greatly afflicted in the death of the beloved pastor, Rev. P. B. Thayer, whose long ministry and lovely character have greatly endeared him to his people.

SACO.—Rev. P. H. Moore has decided to stay with the church another year. This is his first pastorate. He will go to Europe this summer for his vacation.

New Hampshire.

NASHUA.—Pilgrim. A Young Men's Sunday Evening Club of 30 members, recently formed here, has, with the pastor, inaugurated "a prompt, varied, businesslike people's gospel service." That the movement is a success is shown by the large number in attendance each Sunday night, and it is hoped it will be the means of drawing many into sympathy with Christ.——First. In the interest of good citizenship the pastor, Rev. Cyrus Richardson, D. D., during the past winter has led a class of more than 30 members in the discussion of themes in the line of civil duties, meeting once in two weeks. Twelve lectures were given on the following and similar subjects: The Relation of the Family to the State, The Perils Connected with Our Elections, The Sanctity and Sacrilege of the Ballot, Law in Its Relation to the Government of the People, The Perils and Reforms of the Executive Department, The Basis and Progress of Civil Service. After a lecture members had the privilege of asking questions and were required to take notes and make an abstract of each lecture and be prepared to read it at the opening of the following meeting. Reviews were frequent. The class held a town meeting, to which the public were invited. The warrant announced articles for discussion. All participating in the winter's work were greatly delighted and profited. The pastor also gave, on Sunday evenings, several sermons on good citizenship.

NORTH HAMPTON.—Three of the chief officers of the Sunday school have been in continuous service for a quarter of a century. In itself this is a high testimonial to their faithfulness and efficiency in promoting the best interests of the school. The 25th anniversary was pleasantly commemorated by appropriate festivities on the evening of May 20, the parties of honor, by a little planning, having been attracted to the vestry, which they not only found tastefully decorated for the occasion, but filled with 150 or more of members of the school and other friends ready to extend to them their hearty congratulations. A pleasing program was carried out. During these 25 years 120 from the school were received to the church on confession.

CONCORD.—At the annual meeting of the Congregational Ministers' and Widows' Fund Society the expenses were shown to be $2,300. The amount of $45,000 still remains in the treasury. The society is strong and helpful. C. T. Page was chosen president.

BRIDGEWATER.—The revival meetings inaugurated under Evangelist Whittier recently have been continued by Evangelist Whitney of Fitzwilliam with added power, until all the young men in the village under 22 years of age, except one, have been hopefully converted.

WELLS RIVER.—The labors of Rev. R. G. Bugbee, the pastor, have been greatly blessed, 58 persons having been added to the church within two years. The work of the Y. P. S. C. E. has been greatly prospered, the Juniors being led by Mrs. Bugbee.

MORRISVILLE.—Dr. W. A. Robinson, a former resident, goes to England in June, to assist in laying the corner stone of a church to be erected in Gainsborough to the memory of John Robinson. Dr. Robinson is a direct descendant.

SALISBURY.—The church has expended about $500 on the exterior of its edifice, righting the spire, slating the roof and painting.

ST. ALBANS.—Mr. N. H. Dutcher of this place, who has completed his Junior year at Andover Seminary, supplies at Sudbury this summer.

DANVILLE.—The contract for the new house of worship has been let and work begins at once.

Rhode Island.

PROVIDENCE.—Edgewood. A fine lot all paid for, $10,000 in cash and pledges, the hope of $10,000 from the churches and individuals of the State, enthusiasm and faith combine to make the prospect of an adequate house for this new houseless church rational.——Plymouth. The average attendance at Sunday school is 365. The last payment has just been made on a building lot for a larger house. Over 30 persons have been added to the membership since Rev. S. H. Woodrow assumed the pastoral work.——Beneficent. This strong mother church often sends its members away to strengthen churches in the more distant part of the city, but ceases not to maintain its numbers and benevolence. Death has taken away the oldest member, who had been 75 years on the church roll.——Highland. This church has just been received into conference fellowship. The membership is 54. The Sunday school has increased irom 180 to 247.——Union. Asa Lyman, the clerk of the church, died almost instantly at the close of the regular prayer meeting, just after he had risen to nominate a delegate to represent the church at the annual conference. A new card catalogue with a neighborhood catalogue of membership has been made.——Free Swedish. Rev. J. P. Eagle stretches out his influence among his own nation beyond his local church. At Auburn he holds regular services Sunday afternoon and Friday evening with some assistance. An Endeavor Society and a Sunday school have been formed there, and at Attleboro, Mass., a meeting hall has been secured and preaching services are held every Wednesday evening.——Free Evangelical. The 53d anniversary of this church was observed May 24. If the church could secure the value of its property, it would be willing to change its location on account of the encroachment of large manufactories near it.——Central Eight persons from the Portuguese mission have united with this church on confession. The greater portion of the financial debt has been provided for, with no diminution of the usual benevolences.

PAWTUCKET.—The weekly printed calendar is a means of great helpfulness. Rev. Alexander McGregor, the pastor, was nominated by the State conference as a corporate member of the A. B. C. F. M.——Swedish is enjoying a deep, spiritual interest. Rev. B. J. Thoren, the pastor, preaches regularly at Rumford, where a new chapel was dedicated May 3. He also looks after a congregation at Woonsocket.——Weeden Street has just voted to secure land and press the work of a large building, its growth making such a step an absolute necessity.——Park Place. The young people are a large factor in the work of this church. They are quick to visit the sick with tokens of sympathy.

CHEPACHET.—The largest attendance of members at any communion service for 50 years was witnessed at the May meeting. Fifty dollars for a share in the jubilee fund of the A. M. A. was voted as a thank offering by the church and society at its semi-centennial celebration.

BARRINGTON.—The society of this church is continuing the salary of the lately deceased pastor to his widow until July 1. The church has met other recent losses by the death of Benjamin Martin, for 36 years a devoted deacon, and of L. B. Kendall, a benevolent helper in the church.

CENTRAL FALLS.—The church received 12 on confession at the last communion as the first fruits of the union evangelistic services in March, under Rev. C. L. Jackson.

Connecticut.

DANBURY.—First. The bi-centennial of the church was celebrated May 27 and on the days following. The historical address was given by Rev. A F. Pierce, the pastor. Judge L. D. Brewster spoke on Relation of the Church to the Town, and Mayor G. M. Rindle responded. Several other speakers were listened to, and Dr. C. R Palmer gave an address on What Congregational Churches Stand for. The attendance at services has been large. Fifteen pastors have served the church.

NEW HAVEN.—Howard Avenue. A reception was given by the congregation to Prof. H. K. Beach, May 27, in honor of his 10th anniversary of his service as organist. The many persons present heard some fine selections of music. Addresses were also given by the pastor, Rev. W. J. Mutch, and others. When a valuable token of appreciation was given Professor Beach, the pastor was also remembered with an acceptable reminder of the 11th anniversary of his pastorate.

NAUGATUCK.—A large congregation was present at the meeting in the Mission Chapel at Union City, Sunday evening, it being Rev. Sherrod Soule's last sermon before going abroad. He will return about Aug. 1.

MIDDLEBURY.—The church celebrated its 100th anniversary last week, with special services which were well attended by persons from neighboring places. The pastor, Rev. W. F. Avery, gave the chief address.

ESSEX.—The Congregational Swedes of this place and Ivoryton intend to build a meeting house in the latter place. Ground has been purchased for that purpose and quite a sum of money is already subscribed.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

ROCHESTER.—Plymouth. There is now a strong bicycle club connected with the church and a new bicycle house stands at the rear of the meeting house to accommodate the many wheelmen who attend the services.

The meeting house at Brandon has been equipped with a bell, and that in Bangor has refitted and furnished its vestry.

THE SOUTH.

Florida.

TAMPA.—Rev. and Mrs. E. P. Herrick celebrated their silver wedding in the church parlors May 25. A silver coin for Clara Barton's rescue work was requested in place of the usual presents. More than $45 were realized.

Texas.

Evangelist C. W. Byron and wife have just closed a series of meetings with the First Church at Paris. There were over 40 conversions and Christians were greatly blessed.——Mr. Byron is now holding services with the Grand Avenue Branch, Dallas, using his tent, which accommodates 1,500 persons.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

CLEVELAND.—Lakeview. Mr. G. V. Zotarelli, who has charge of the successful Italian work of this church, has also undertaken a new work at the Central Friendly Inn, the use of the commodious chapel having been granted by the Non-partisan W. C. T. U. More than 100 persons attended the opening service.——Franklin Avenue. When Rev. H. O. Allen became pastor seven years ago the new building was only half-finished, and the church was burdened with a heavy debt and greatly discouraged. During his pastorate 200 new members have been received, 125 on confession. The church passed strong resolutions of regret at his leaving, and the dismissing council spoke in highest terms of his abilities and faithfulness both as preacher and pastor and the valuable service he has rendered in many self-sacrificing ways to the general interests of all the Cleveland churches. The church tendered Mr. and Mrs. Allen a large farewell reception. Mr. Allen goes to Wisconsin for a summer vacation and expects to resume work in the fall.

TOLEDO.—Washington Street. The acceptance of the call to this pastorate by Rev. G. A. Burgess has given general satisfaction. Mr. Burgess is a graduate of Brown University and Bates Seminary and has been a prominent educator. He comes to this church from the Free Will Baptists and from the presidency of Winnebago College, Minnesota.

In our notice, last week, of Dr. J. W. Hubbell's death we erred in stating that he "was not in the active ministry for several years prior to his death." He died in the 10th year of his service as the beloved pastor of the First Church, Mansfield, one of the largest of our Ohio churches.

Michigan.

DETROIT.—First. The council which met May 27 formally installed the new pastor, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton. The roll showed a large representation from various centers in the State. Appreciative reminders of Dr. Boynton's earlier service in the East were reiterated and, with such thoughts in mind, the council was little disposed to question him. The evening service brought a strong welcome to the new pastor from the spokesmen and from the congregation of the church. Dr. E. B. Webb preached the sermon, as he did also at Dr. Boynton's ordination and at his installation at Haverhill and Boston. Pres. W. G. Sperry, D. D., offered the prayer.

THE WEST.

Iowa.

SIOUX CITY.—Rev. M. W. Darling preached hi tenth anniversary sermon May 24. During his pastorate the membership has grown from 150 to 505. No communion service has passed without accessions. The exact number received during the decade is 495. A fine building has been erected. With a strong and united church Mr. and Mrs. Darling have reason to rejoice in the memory of their labor here, and a host of friends rejoice with them.——Mayflower. Rev. R. W. Jamison has moved his mission down town. At present the Ballington Booth American Volunteers are co operating with him in large meetings held every night.

KEOSAUQUA.—Rev. W. B. Hague of S. Bridgton, Me., who some weeks ago was called to this pastorate, has returned from a three weeks' visit to the field. His answer has not yet been given.

MARION.—At the last report about 60 persons had applied for membership, most of whom began the Christian life in the union meetings conducted by Evangelist Williams.

DENMARK.—The Iowa H. M. S. recently received $400 by bequest from the estate of the late Oliver Brooks, for more than 50 years clerk of this church.

At Burlington special union meetings are now in progress, under the leadership of Evangelist Chapman.

At the State Association a determined and persistent attempt was made to get the body to take some action concerning the Bay (Cal.) Association of churches as respects its action in suspending Rev. C. O. Brown, D. D. The brethren who urged it so strongly were simply contending for a principle of Congregationalism as they saw it, but the motions were voted down.

Minnesota.

WAYZATA.—The ordination of Miss Alice R. Palmer, May 28, was an interesting occasion. She has been a valued worker in the W. C. T. U. in Africa and in other portions of the East. Of Presbyterian origin, she has always felt drawn to the ministry. Her examination showed her to be well grounded in the faith, to have a high and normal school education, with a large fund of sanctified common sense. The church has prospered during her five months' ministry. Nearly all the Minneapolis churches were represented. A cablegram of congratulation was received from Lady Henry Somerset, Miss F. E. Willard and Miss Anna Gordon. There are three ordained women now preaching in the State.

SPRING VALLEY.—First. The 40th anniversary of organization was observed May 24, 25. Rev. Dr. J. A. Chamberlin preached the sermon and the pastor, Rev. P. H. Harmon, D. D., conducted the roll-call. More than 100 members responded to their names and 16 communications from former pastors and absent members were read. Rev. Messrs. R. G. Jones, W. W. Gist and Henry Faville gave the principal addresses. The exercises closed with a banquet in the Masonic Temple, which was largely attended and heartily enjoyed.

ST. PAUL.—Hazel Park. Some repairs have been made upon the building and a few debts paid. Congregations are increasing and there is marked interest since the coming of Rev. T. A. Turner.——Gladstone. A Sunday school of 100 members and a C. E. Society have been organized, under the lead of the People's Church, Rev. S. G. Smith pastor; and a subscription has been raised for a new chapel which, with help from the C. C. B. S., will be erected at once.

RANDALL.—Great interest is awakened by the prospect of a meeting house, the only one in the place. The foundation has been laid and the completion is expected in July. Much credit is due to Mr. W. R. McClane, a student from Carleton College who is preaching here for the summer. Four new members have been received into fellowship.

MOORHEAD.—Rev. C. E. Harris, Jr., was installed pastor, May 21, by a large and representative council. The excellent doctrinal paper presented by Mr. Harris was well received. He has had unusual educational advantages and gives promise of becoming an efficient workman.

ANOKA.—During the three years' ministry of Rev. H. N. Pringle there have been a large number of additions, and the church is in a much better state except that financial troubles make it difficult to sustain preaching.

Kansas.

HYMER.—A church of nine members was organized, May 17, by Superintendents Broad and Bush. The occasion was one of deep interest. The movement originated in meetings held by Rev. G. M. Pfeiffer, pastor at Diamond Springs, who will also supply at Hymer. The new enterprise is in Chase County, near "Diamond Ranch," which contains 30,000 acres owned by an English syndicate. This ranch is the great industry of the region, as 8,000 cattle graze upon it. Its managers and employés, as well as the farmers in a wide territory, encourage the new religious movement, and a meeting house will soon be erected. This is the only church in the village or vicinity.

Evangelist Veazie has closed brief, successful services at Severy and Western Park, preparing the way for the union of the two fields under one pastor.——Six students will supply fields in the State this summer—three from Yale Seminary, one from Oberlin, one from Canada and one from Washburn College.

The cyclones occurring Sunday, May 17, and later brought desolation into some Congregational fields and severe loss to the people and work. Sabetha, Seneca, Oneida and the northern part of Clay County were struck. The meeting houses at Oneida and Goshen (Clay County) are in ruins. So far as is known no persons connected with the churches and congregations were killed, but some lost their homes and suffered personal injuries. It is believed that the area of the calamity is small. Local help will be sufficient to meet the needs of individuals rendered homeless. But the churches are too poor to rebuild without aid, and this feature appeals strongly to the spirit of fellowship in more favored parts of our land. Rev. L. P. Broad, superintendent of home missions, Topeka, will give reliable information concerning these pressing needs.

North Dakota.

KELSO.—The people were made happy May 24 by the dedication of a neat and commodious house of worship. The work began with a Sunday school formed May 1, 1895, and the church was organized the following October. The dedicatory services were conducted by the pastor, Rev. N. P. McQuarrie, assisted by Prof. W. A. Deering, dean of Fargo College, Supt. E. H. Stickney and others. All in the community enjoy the privilege of worshiping in their own meeting house. Mr. McQuarrie is an earnest and faithful worker and his efforts are highly appreciated.

REYNOLDS.—The preliminary organization for the Congregational church has been effected by Rev. J. D. Whitelaw. Work was begun here last September and is progressing rapidly, with good prospects. Mr. Whitelaw preaches at Buxton in the morning, Reynolds in the afternoon and Cummings in the evening.

FARGO.—The meetings conducted by Evangelist Hunt closed May 28. They have been well attended and full of interest and many conversions are reported. Though the weather has been unfavorable, much good has been accomplished.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

OAKLAND.—Mrs. H. G. Noyes of this city, formerly of Binghamton, N. Y., bequeathed over $11,000 to various societies, among them the California H. M. Society, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. of Oakland and the C. C. B. S. She also gave $1,250 for Chinese work on the Pacific coast; $120 to Rev. W. C. Pond, its superintendent; $2,500 to establish the Noyes scholarship in Pacific Seminary; $1,000 to Pomona College, and $500 for the kindergarten work of the First Church, Oakland.

Washington.

BELLEVIEW.—A C. E. Society of 16 active members has just been organized. The church is only a few months old but several members are to be added at the next communion, and all departments give evidence of vigorous life.

The women of the churches are taking the lead in bringing the importance of missions before the people. An all-day meeting was greatly enjoyed by the Seattle churches, May 13, and a week later the Tacoma women held a rally in which a large number of churches participated.

Oregon.

The 25th anniversary of the organization of Hassalo Street Church, Portland, was fittingly celebrated May 14.——A partial result of revival interest at Forest Grove was the admission of five young people at the May communion. Others interested will unite in due time.

SPRING MEETING OF THE WOMAN'S BOARD.

Edwards Church, Northampton, opened its hospitable doors for the semi-annual meeting of the Woman's Board of Missions, May 27. In this connection Hampshire County Branch celebrated its twentieth anniversary, and the first part of the morning session was devoted to the work of the branch, Mrs. William Gallagher presiding. Mrs. Merrill E. Gates conducted a devotional service and Mrs. Joseph Marsh welcomed the guests. The reports of the branch secretaries, Miss Tyler and Miss Hunt, showed encouraging gain among the young people. The treasurer, Miss Kneeland, reported the receipts for the year $2,569. Mrs. D. W. Marsh gave a Twenty Years' Review of the history of the branch. Organized with a bare quota of local societies, it now numbers forty-two. Mrs. Colton of Easthampton is the only survivor of the original board of officers. The aggregate of contributions for the twenty years is $50,522. During the singing of an original birthday hymn special birthday offerings were presented by the societies, amounting to $271.46, which is to be added to money already given as a memorial to Mrs. William H. Stoddard, the first president of the branch, the whole sum, $700, to be appropriated to some foreign mission work which shall be associated with Mrs. Stoddard's name.

The last hour of the morning and the entire afternoon session were under the auspices of the board, Mrs. Judson Smith presiding. Mrs. Gallagher, in behalf of the branch, welcomed the board. The statement of the treasurer, Miss Carruth, reported receipts for six months: from contributions $47,679 65, from legacies $18,820.85, total $66,500.50. Miss Stanwood, secretary, in an address entitled Mid-year Observations, reviewed the events of the half-year. New Haven Branch has celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary and New York Branch its twentieth. Special effort has been made to increase membership. Of the six months' contributions more than one-tenth has been designated by the donors for extra objects, including Armenian relief, American Board debt and other special calls, thus reducing the amount available for the definite work for which the board has pledged itself, and rendering most vigilant effort necessary for the remainder of the year in order that by Oct. 18 funds may be received sufficient to provide for the work which legitimately belongs to the board. The home secretary, Miss Child, having visited India, Ceylon and China, is now in Japan and expects to sail from Yokohama for Vancouver June 19. Miss Kyle, field secretary, has had several encouraging touring campaigns. Miss May, assistant treasurer, has been compelled by ill health to resign. Several missionaries have come home for rest: Miss Stone from Bulgaria, the Misses Ely, Miss Bartlett, Miss Harlow and Miss Pierce from Turkey, Miss Nugent from India, Miss Talcott, Miss Kent and Miss Daniels from Japan, and Miss Crosby from Micronesia. Miss Noyes is now returning to India and Miss Gilson has gone to Gazaland. A tribute was paid to the heroism of the missionaries in Turkey, and the echo of the call which comes loud and often from there and from other lands made it more sure than ever that the time is not yet for remitting most diligent and vigilant effort.

Miss Lamson, secretary of junior work, in an address entitled, The Half That Has Not Been Told, urged the importance of more definite organization among young people and of more efficiency in this direction among Christian Endeavorers, saying, "We have been too well satisfied that the burdens of our missionary organization should be lifted by hands fitted by years of experience to handle them wisely."

Interesting addresses were made by Miss Mary B. Daniels, recently returned from Japan, Miss Ellen M. Stone of Bulgaria and Mrs. J. K. Browne of Harpoot, Turkey. Mrs. George M. Rowland gave a graphic account of A Day's Experience in Tottori, Japan, and Mrs. Chauncey Goodrich of Tungcho held the audience for half an hour speaking of The Awakening of China. A large audience was present at the two sessions.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

The Endeavorers of a South Carolina town propose to distribute in public places a supply of fans bearing printed notices of church and society meetings.

The Sunday school committee of a society in Watertown, N. Y., furnishes the members of the society each month with slips of paper containing Bible readings on some definite topic.

A society in Baltimore, Md., became much interested in two young Scotchmen, who are studying medicine in that city with a view to becoming foreign missionaries, and secured means to furnish rooms for their use during the time of their stay.

A sunshine committee in India has visited and helped 323 poor people during the year. The spirit of the society is shown by the fact that it raised $250 within a fortnight to pay the church debt, and it keeps on hand a load of wood to help any that are in want.

A permanent temperance pledge for the signatures of members was provided two or three years ago by the Union Park Society of Chicago It has been framed, and is placed on the wall of the lecture-room, ready to receive new signatures at any time. The societies belonging to the west division of the Chicago Union are being urged to adopt a similar course.

The first society in Peking, China, formed one year ago, has already grown to five, and the membership has become tenfold what it was.——A two weeks' musical convention was arranged by a society at Columbiana, O., for the purpose of improving the singing in the church.——A Junior, fifteen years old, of St. Paul, Minn., a week after uniting with the church, formed a class of children from four to eleven years old for the study of the Bible.

A paper on Sabbath observance was presented at a conference on Christian citizenship held by the local union of Mt. Vernon, N. Y., last March. As a consequence a petition was at once circulated asking for the closing of the post office in that place on Sunday. The petition, bearing about 2,000 signatures, was forwarded to Washington with letters from leading citizens, and in less than a week the reply was sent that the post office would be closed, as requested.

In place of the white caps that have been the badge of past convention committees, the Washington committees will be distinguished by white straw hats with bands of red, white and blue, bearing the name of the committee. Headquarters at the Riggs House, for the benefit of any women attending the convention as representatives of papers, will be kept open from 11.30 to 2 and from 4 to 8 each day during the convention, and will be in charge of a committee appointed by the Woman's National Press Association. The Washington Homeopathic Medical Society intends to establish a tent on the White lot, where free medical attention can be given in case of emergency. Free admission to the Corcoran Art Gallery is to be granted to any visitors wearing the convention badge. All who are serving at the headquarters of the committee of '96 are Endeavorers, and every evening they hold a brief service of prayer for the convention.

THE exhibit of Old Blue Delft Plaques in Jones, McDuffee & Stratton's Art Pottery Rooms includes some of the best examples of that famous pottery.

WINDSOR — 1726.

It must not be forgotten that chairs were costly and very scarce in Colonial times, and stools were mainly used.

One of the most famous of all Colonial Chairs is the Windsor Chair, which owes its name to the fact that the first chair of this shape was discovered by George III. in a shepherd's hut in Windsor, the shepherd having himself made it, largely with his pocket knife. The king found it so comfortable that he at once ordered others made like it, and thus the chair was introduced.

When the Boston Public Library looked for the most comfortable chairs for its reading rooms, they adopted unanimously the Windsor Chair, as a seat that could not be improved upon.

We have secured some reproductions of a famous Windsor Chair, brought to Philadelphia by Governor Patrick Gordon in 1726. It is a true Windsor, and delightfully comfortable. The opportunity to secure one of these historic patterns may not occur again. The chair is not at all expensive. You will want half a dozen of them when you see and try one.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

Another week has passed and no marked improvement in the character of general trade is seen. But improvement is to be noted in the demand for hides, leather and shoes, and these articles have an advancing tendency. Cotton goods are in oversupply and dull and low. Most of the woolen mills in the country are working on reduced time or simply on orders. Stocks of old raw wool are large and, as the new clip is beginning to arrive, prices naturally are in buyers' favor.

Despite the attempts of large iron and steel manufacturers to curtail production so as to prevent a glut, the market is oversupplied and prices are scarcely steady. Men in the trade do not look for much improvement in the iron industry until after the middle of July at least. During the week ended Saturday the course of prices in staples was downwards. Flour, coal, hides, leather, sugar and print cloths were about the only staples to hold their own.

Collections do not seem to be any more satisfactory than formerly. At the financial centers very little commercial paper is making. The supply of money is in excess of the demand, and good grade paper is eagerly snapped up at easy rates. The whole business world here is waiting to see what will be done on the money question at the St. Louis convention before making any new commitments of capital.

As to the speculative markets there is little to say. In Wall Street especially speculation has been practically dead. It is probable, however, that there will be more activity just prior and succeeding the St. Louis convention. If that convention declares for gold a good-sized bull market ought to follow, in which all classes of stocks will participate in the advance movement.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. PETER BLAKE THAYER,

The beloved, venerable pastor of the Congregational Church in Garland, Me., died at the parsonage, May 25, after a brief but painful illness. Mr. Thayer was born in Alstead, N. H., Feb. 29, 1816, graduated from Bangor Theological Seminary in 1847, and the following year was ordained in Garland, Me., where he has remained as pastor ever since, spending his summer vacations in Northern Aroostook doing missionary work. Father Thayer, as he was called, was for many years a trustee of Bangor Seminary and of the Maine H. M. S. He was accustomed to attend the large gatherings of the missionary societies and was looking forward to the jubilee celebration of the A. M. A., being one of the few original members of that organization fifty years ago.

NOW'S THE CHANCE.—No reader of this paper should miss the rare chance to secure one of those "Windsor" Colonial chairs described in another column by the Paine Furniture Co. These are the chairs which were adopted by the Boston Public Library as a reading chair. They have a famous history, having been discovered by George III. in a shepherd's hut while the royal monarch was hunting in Windsor. They are not at all expensive and can only be procured at these warerooms.

HALF RATES TO ST. LOUIS AND RETURN.—On account of the Republican National Convention the B. & O. R. R. will sell tickets from all points in New England to St. Louis and return at half rates, good going June 12 to 15, and to return until June 21. Route is via New York, Philadelphia and Washington. These rates are open to the public and an excellent opportunity is afforded to visit St Louis during the great convention. For rates and further information address A. J. Simmons, N. E. ## WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

PILGRIM HALL, CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, MAY 29.

Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, well known for her missionary temperance work around the world, was the leader, and read Christ's last commission as given in Matt. 28: 19, 20. She especially commended American missionaries for the way they were "teaching . . . to observe all things," and quoted an English missionary in Zululand who, speaking of the work of his society, said, "We need a Pixley, a Wilder," continuing the list of American missionaries; "none hold the people to so high a standard as they." She read the parallel passages in Mark and Luke, and spoke of the philanthropy growing out of missionary work, of the lack of benevolent institutions under any but the Christian religion; not until brought into contact with them as established by missionaries, and induced by shame and a desire to compete with them, do the followers of other faiths start work of that kind.

Miss Stanwood read the names on the calendar for the week with a few words of explanation, giving the latest intelligence from Sivas, Cæsarea and Talas, and then introduced Miss Pierce, who but two weeks ago arrived in this country from Aintab where she has been for twenty-one years without a visit home, and in that time has not lost a week through sickness. Miss Pierce spoke of their terrible experiences in connection with the massacre of Nov. 16, their first intimation of actual outrages coming in a letter from Harpoot; of her incredulity concerning the possibility of a similar experience there; of the self-control of their girls while the massacre was going on; of Dr. Hamilton and Miss Trowbridge who, with only native assistance, cared for the wounded as they were brought in; of the danger which she and her party met even on their way to the coast, when their guard advised their turning back, but some soldiers coming from another direction promised to protect them. Mrs. J. K. Browne announced that four of the Red Cross agents had reached Harpoot, and Mrs. Browne and Mrs. S. B Pratt offered prayer for the afflicted people in these fields.

EDUCATION.

— By recent enactment of the State legislature twenty new free scholarships in the Worcester Polytechnic Institute become available to the next entering class. This makes forty free scholarships in all available, one for every senatorial district in the State, in addition to the twenty-five or more free scholarships to which students from Worcester County only are eligible.

— The new president of Rollins College, Rev. George M. Ward of Lowell, who has just entered upon his duties, is a graduate of Dartmouth College and of the Boston Law School. His enthusiastic work as the first general secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor has made him well known throughout the country. The wide acquaintance thus formed, his business experience after resigning this position, and his subsequent training for the ministry at Andover Theological Seminary make him peculiarly well fitted for the leadership of Rollins College.

The question, How has God made himself known? is almost equivalent to the question, Has God made himself known? We are unable intelligently or steadfastly to believe in revelation until we rid our mind of misapprehensions of its method and clearly perceive that it is spiritual. We have learned many of the superficial lessons of religion, but its fundamental teachings we have yet to receive. "No man hath seen God at any time": "God is Spirit"—these seem the foundation stones of the whole superstructure; alas! who has received them?—British Weekly.

OUR MORTAL DISEASE.

The mortal disease with which our legislatures are smitten has little or no relation to bills against gambling or lotteries or dueling. Damning those sins legislators have no mind to is the easiest way in the world of compounding for those they are inclined to. Their great temptation is not to send challenges or gamble recklessly, but to make themselves, by purchase, nomination and election, some boss's "man," to go weekly to his office for orders or to take them meekly every day over the long-distant telephone, to sink reason, conscience, independence, the interests or demands of their constituents, and make themselves nothing but voting machines in the hands of the men who buy and sell legislation. This is the hideous cancer that is sapping the life of American legislatures, and while its deadly progress is becoming, as it is, more and more visible in State after State, to talk of improved legislation and waves of morality is going out of one's way to be foolish.—New York Evening Post.

BENJAMIN F. STONE.

The First Congregational Church of Nashua, N. H., has lost in the death of Benjamin F. Stone its oldest member and one of its most genuine and devoted Christians. Mr. Stone had lived nearly a century, having reached his ninety-fifth year. Until within a comparatively few years he has been able to attend church and the Sunday school, where he seemed to find peculiar delight in the study of God's Word. He was a Christian of positive convictions and sterling worth. The promises of God were eternal verities to him. He retained in his old age a remarkable interest in the events of the day both in church and state. Mr. Stone was born in Groton, Mass., lived many years in Lunenburg, Mass., and about twenty years ago came to Nashua to make his home. He leaves a widow, who has already passed her "fourscore and ten." His funeral took place May 21.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER
FOR RHEUMATIC GOUT.

Case of DR. J. A. HANBY, of Patrick C. H., Va., stated by himself:

"For four years I was afflicted with Rheumatic Gout to an extent which incapacitated me entirely for the discharge of the duties of my profession, and was finally reduced to such a condition as to subject me for the most part to confinement to my bed. By the advice of one of my medical attendants, and emphatically as a dernier resort, I determined to make use of the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 2, I am frank to say, without faith in its virtue, having but little confidence in mineral waters. The use, however, of a few doses of the Water was attended by beneficial results so remarkable that I was soon able to be out of bed and upon my feet, and my improvement has continued until I am now actively engaged in the practice of my profession."

This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles, $5 00 f. o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent free to any address. Springs open for guests from June 15th to October 1st.

A minister of the gospel does not belong to any local church. He belongs to humanity. Although he receives a salary from the company of Christians who call him their pastor, his entire time and strength do not belong to these few Christians. He belongs to the city in which he lives, to the denomination whose principles he accepts, and to the church universal of which he is a part.—Rev. C. E. Jefferson.

EUROPEAN PLAN.

THE painter decorates the wall; the artist-in-needle-work decorates the furniture; the emperor decorates with a medal the faithful soldier; but dirt decorates all neglected things and places with its own peculiar badge—a badge of disgrace. Decorative art is a good thing if it does not lead people so high up that they cannot see the dirt that accumulates in the kitchen and in the corners. It is those housekeepers who use SAPOLIO that win the medal of honor and have houses and reputations free from the imputation of a decoration of dirt.

EDUCATION.

—— The Sloane bequest of $200,000, which recently reverted to Yale, will be set apart for the endowment and enlargement of the library.

—— Highland Military Academy, Worcester, had its closing exercises June 3-9, including a prize drill and military exercises, a musicale, oral examinations, prize speaking and graduation address by Mayor Sprague of that city.

—— Saratoga is such a popular resort that the promise of a summer school there from July 6 to Aug. 27 must be welcome to many who are in the habit of spending their vacation there and to many others as well who may now go to Saratoga for the first time, drawn particularly by the educational advantages which are to be forthcoming. The enterprise is managed by a competent local committee and is known technically as the Saratoga Athenæum Summer School and Lectures. Its school of theology will be under the general charge of Prof. Edwin K Mitchell of Hartford, who will have as his coadjutors Professors Stearns and Pratt and Dr. G. L. Walker of Hartford, Professor Creelman of Yale, Dr. Stuckenberg of Cambridge and Professor Gould of Philadelphia. This is a strong force of lecturers. The staff of Union College will conduct a general summer school whose sessions will last six weeks and afford thirty different courses.

—— Straight University has just passed its twenty-seventh anniversary. The attendance, 581, is an increase over the previous year, and it is most noticeable in the higher courses. At the Commencement eight students graduated from the normal department and five from the college preparatory. The latter will return for the college course. Of these thirteen all are professing Christians, with one or two exceptions. Of the forty-eight who finished the English or grammar course all will enter the normal and college preparatory next year. This is the largest class by far in the history of the institution. In educating consecrated teachers and leaders, Straight is doing a work of inestimable value to the colored people of this section of the South. Mr. C. H. Shute, vice-junior commander of the G. A. R., has presented the institution with a fine United States flag. A fine oil painting of Thomy Lafon, the colored benefactor of the school, was presented by the alumni.

—— Tuskegee's fifteenth anniversary was honored by the presence of the governor of Alabama, the first one holding the office to visit the school. His presence gave great satisfaction, and his praise of Mr. Washington and the school was hearty. The year has been a remarkable one, and the receipts have been nearly $25,000 in excess of those of any previous year. The number of students enrolled in the normal department is 1,005 and in the model school 175. There are seventy-eight teachers. Twenty States and Territories have been represented. The students have done practically all the work of the school, receiving wages at an average of five cents per hour. Thus they have paid toward their expenses $45,288 10. The graduating class numbers thirty-one. Seventeen of them have also completed some trade. An interesting feature of Commencement week was competition for the Trinity Church, Boston, prize in oratory, instituted by Dr. Donald. Mr. S. C. Dizer of Boston, Mass., and Mr. J. G. Phelps Stokes of New York City were added to the board of trustees.

POND'S EXTRACT has won a great reputation. Spurious imitations are dear at any price.

CURES, absolute, permanent cures have given Hood's Sarsaparilla the largest sales in the world and the first place among medicines.

MORE curative power is contained in Hood's Sarsaparilla than in any other similar preparation. It costs the proprietor and manufacturer more. It costs the jobber more and it is worth more to the consumer. More skill is required in its preparation and it combines more remedial qualities than any other medicine. Consequently it has a record of more cures and its sales are more than those of any other preparation. Hood's Sarsaparilla is the best medicine to buy because it is an honest medicine and thousands of testimonials prove that it does actually and permanently cure disease.

WHILE the International Sunday School Convention, which meets in Boston a fortnight hence, may not stir the city so conspicuously as the great Endeavor Convention of last summer, the former is not, by any means, a gathering of secondary importance. It is seldom that this city is the rallying place for so large and noteworthy a body of Christians of all evangelical denominations; 2,000 delegates from all over the country, from Canada and foreign lands are expected, and among them are widely-known and honored leaders in the Sunday school cause. Preparations are going on vigorously, and we have no doubt that the warmth of Boston's welcome will do justice to the occasion and the great interests for which the assembly is convened.

The fidelity and devotion of the average Scotch theological professor to the church with which he is identified finds illustration in one of the objects of Dr. George Adam Smith's visit to this country. After his week's stay in Boston he turned his face toward Canada, with the intention of going as far west as Winnipeg. A large number of Scotch immigrants pass through that city every year on their way to the wheat fields beyond, and they constitute an important and promising section of the class for whom missionary effort can be put forth to advantage. Dr. Smith is a member of one of the missionary boards in Scotland which feels in a manner responsible for this migrating army, and he goes to Winnipeg in order better to ascertain what means can be put forth for their evangelization. It is good to see a scholar like Dr. Smith, who values every hour that can be secured for work in his study, giving himself to practical Christian service in this fashion. Mutual benefit would come, both to our missionary causes and to our theological seminaries, if the churches could and would utilize more frequently some of the talent that is too often now confined mainly to the instruction of theologues.

What has become of some of the special wheelmen's services that started out so bravely last summer? We recall one or two heroic attempts in this vicinity to establish a Sunday morning meeting designed for the riders of bicycles, but we have seen no intimation of their re establishment. In a neighboring city a half-hour service at nine o'clock for all riders was extensively announced a few weeks ago, the privilege being accorded of attending "attired just as they would be were they going to start out on a fifty-mile ride." To two large clubs in particular special invitations were sent, prominent men welcomed the wheelmen and the boy choir furnished the music. At the first one of these services those whose costumes indicated them to be riders could almost be numbered on the fingers of two hands, while not less than thirty-five riders passed by the door during the hour of worship. We do not look upon such a result as particularly gratifying, however good the intentions of those who projected the experiment. We do not believe that bicyclers as individuals, or as members of a club, are attracted by services designed particularly for them, and the problem of the church's duty toward this large and increasing element in our population is not to be solved by any such half-way work as this. Those who wish to reach and bless them must approach them as human beings and not as a detached class.

The last few months have witnessed the forthputting of at least two remarkable contributions to theological literature touching the person of Christ. Dr. George A. Gordon's Christ of Today has been recognized on both sides of the water as an exceptionally able and trenchant restatement and vindication of the doctrine of our Lord's divinity. We think that Dr. Henry van Dyke's recent Lyman Beecher lectures at Yale when put into book form will also take high rank as a timely and enduring defense of the divinity of Christ. Though the subject of the course was The Gospel for an Age of Doubt, the lectures centered around the person of Christ, his relation to the Father and his adaptation to the world's need. The difference between such books and so comparatively recent a volume on the same subject as Canon Liddon's Divinity of Our Lord is noticeable particularly in the undogmatic and scientific spirit with which these later defenders of the doctrine approach their theme. But no early or later apologist is more insistent than these modern, liberal preachers of Boston and New York in their contention that Jesus Christ is the Son of God in the same sense in which the Christian Church through the ages has regarded him. We may all rejoice that the inevitable reconstruction which has been going on and will go on in the realm of modern thought bids fair to establish more securely than ever the central doctrine of our faith.

While Christian activities of a certain character necessarily lag somewhat during the summer months, the season opens other lines of endeavor which should not be ignored. There has been a steadily growing appreciation of the advantages of open air services during the last few years, particularly since the organization of the Open Air Workers' Association. This body, through its publications and its annual conventions, the last of which was recently held in Brooklyn, is bringing to the attention of the churches the opportunities which almost any sizable city or summer resort furnishes for such work. The testimony which it has collected in its third annual report from scores of men who are preaching in the open air constitutes all the argument needed for a more general adoption. This report may be obtained from the secretary of the association, Miss E. V. Prentice, 77 State Street, Brooklyn. They are not cranks who believe in the idea, but some of the most earnest and prudent leaders of aggressive Christian work, like Dr. T. S. Hamlin of Washington, Rev. E. H. Byington of Brooklyn and Rev. R. A. Torrey of Chicago, are counted among its heartiest advocates. They see, what must be evident to any discerning eye, that slowly but surely in this country, as in England, the open air meeting is coming to be a channel through which all sorts of ideas are being widely disseminated. Why should not the gospel message ring out to the multitudes, and thus neutralize wild socialistic harangues?

In summing up the work of the Presbyterian General Assembly at Saratoga, it must be put to the credit of the church that it has turned its face from strife. Assemblies (as Dr. Hodge said in a famous review article) are not always wise, but they are apt to reflect the immediate opinion of the churches at the time of meeting. Delegates are chosen to a large extent by the presbyteries on a system of rotation which brings up fresh material year by year, and not upon lines of supposed efficiency and experience as in the Methodist General Conference. Little noticed among other work of the assembly was the final discharge of the committee on church union, which has for years been coquetting with the Episcopalians. There is something pathetic about the exchange of Christian courtesies, prayers and good wishes which has been going on, while from the first the essential disagreement has been carefully avoided. And the whole difference is the difference of the definition of the word bishop with all the consequences it entails! The assembly withdraws from the correspondence, asserting the validity of its church life, and the matter rests exactly where it began. We trust that the harmonious meeting of the assembly may be the prophecy of a year of prosperity and growth.

It is not wise to ask any man to preach as a candidate, or scarcely even as a supply for a single Sunday, about whom nothing more is known than that his name is on the list of Congregational ministers in the Year-Book. But it is utterly and inexcusably hazardous to employ a man whose name is not there, and as to whom there is no sure proof in any other way that he has a recognized standing in the ministry. Perhaps he may have a good standing somewhere else, and perhaps not. There appears to be a set of men, not far from Boston, of this very negatively questionable order, who work together in attempting to impose themselves upon our churches. One of them writes to a church for himself, or for one of the others, to say that by the blessing of the Lord he or his brother is able to preach for little or no pay. If one of them is engaged to preach, the blessing of the Lord does not hinder his presenting a bill afterward. Luckily, they are all poor preachers, so that they are not likely to be sent for a second time. But when a church committee gets an epistle of this sort from any such man, with an offer of service, whether the first letter of his name is F or R or W, or any other letter of the alphabet, it is safe to throw that epistle into the fire and bless the Lord that nothing else needs to be done.

SEVENTY YEARS OF HOME MISSIONS.

The Congregational Home Missionary Society did well to celebrate attaining threescore years and ten of life by holding, for the first time, its annual meeting in New England, and last week's deliberations in New Haven, Ct., must be described as superior if not extraordinary. Whether judged by the large attendance, the high average of the speeches made or the suggestive information scattered broadcast on fertile soil, it was a successful meeting.

That the society has closed one epoch in its career and is about entering upon another is realized by its officials. Speaking in broad terms, the era of State-building, college-planting and giving American institutions to citizens of native stock is about to give way to an era of city-saving, foreign home missionary work, and preventing atavism in older communities once ignorant and vicious, then intelligent and God fearing, and now in danger of reverting to their original type. Of course the work typical of the past era will not cease, but it will be subordinated to the newer problems.

Would that the society, as it begins its new epoch, had no debt and was in receipt of adequate contributions from the churches and individuals, but such is not the case. Would that the Swett Fund, just lapsed, could have been followed by the Stickney Fund, set apart for the same worthy purpose, viz., work among the foreigners of our cities, but as a matter of fact nearly half of Mr. Stickney's large bequest has already been used to pay last year's expenses. Do the constituents of the society realize that if $70,000 of the bequest of Mr. Stickney had not been available, and if the General Howard Roll had not brought in $88,500 in extra gifts, the society would have ended last year and begun the new era with a debt of $200,000? Do they realize that the receipts for the current year are far short of the sum necessary to pay current expenses, much less aid in extinguishing the debt? One is almost tempted to add, Do the officials of the society realize it? or, if they do, Why are they not more importunate? Optimism ceases to be a virtue when a certain line is passed.

OPIATE OR OPPORTUNITY.

The days of summer reading have returned and literature begins to be associated once more with the hammock and the lawn. If we sifted earlier to be rid of chaff, we sift now to be quit of heaviness. Except in the summer schools study is at a discount and entertainment seems for the moment the chief end of man. For the elders books are become an invitation to drowsiness or a suggestion of agreeable talk and comparison of opinions; for the young, a prelude or interlude of exercise, or, possibly, flirtation. Or, if this seem too unfair a picture of the summer voyager who adventures for rest among the mountain peaks or by the sounding shore of the multitudinous sea, at least it may be accepted as an extreme which shows the tendency, and he would be rash indeed who ventured to assert that the center of gravity of the book trade is the same in July as in December.

Summer reading may indeed be opiate or opportunity. We may choose to be drugged to hazy, iridescent visions by drowsy stories, or we may turn aside from the letter of our worktime obligations to explore some interesting but neglected field of thought. It may be duty for the moment to accept the drowsy potion. To the overworked student or business man or housekeeper the opiate may for the time become an opportunity, but even in vacation time it can hardly long be satisfying to healthy minds.

Far be it from us, however, wholly to decry the novel for vacation reading, or to intimate that the poppy is the only drug in the story writer's pharmacopœia. There are stories mixed with strychnine, nerve stimulating rather than nerve soothing, and he who wants the stir of battle may find it in the pages of our modern school of novelists. It will be an error therefore to imagine that any story will mean rest, or to think that all we need to do is to invest from five to fifty cents in a paper covered book at the nearest news stand to be sure of recreation.

Leisure is an opportunity which every man will use according to his idiosyncrasy, and to the improvement or deterioration of his character. In our vacation some part of it will be devoted to reading. The American takes to print as the Oriental takes to coffee or tobacco. Would it not be well, since life is short and leisure not too frequent, to choose beforehand with some deliberate consideration the literary uses of holiday time? The world is full of books; magazines clamor for recognition; newspapers are thrust in our faces at the remotest holiday resorts. Shall we take what comes to us without discrimination? Or shall we do our own deliberate choosing and advance our knowledge of the best the past and present have to offer? It costs no more to read a good book than a bad one, and the difference of the returns is enormous.

Quite aside from the question of immediate reward is a further practical reason for choosing the best reading. The chief use of vacation is to prepare the mind for work. To come home and take up the problems of life again with a mind stupefied by drowsy vacation reading is to find the beginnings of the new work year hard to bear. To come home with a mind alert because it has been pleasantly occupied with good reading is to come prepared for successful grappling with the problems of work. The mind wants rest, but it finds rest in change and not stupidity. The wisest men have kept their minds in tune by adding an avocation to their regular vocation and have rejoiced in leisure because it allowed them to bring their avocation to the front.

A MODEL CITY.

Not perfect, but a model, in that though it has 80,000 inhabitants or more it has had no saloons for ten years; because for nearly twenty years its municipal elections have been fought out over the merit or demerit of individuals and municipal policies for which they have stood and not because the individuals were in sympathy or out of sympathy with certain political parties in control of State and national affairs; because its friends of temperance sink personal differences of opinion and overlook differences of habit in order to combine to exclude the saloon; because its clergymen forget sectarianism in the effort to secure sobriety, thrift and righteousness; because its university's professors and undergraduates work shoulder to shoulder with its merchants and wage-earners in the effort to exorcise evil and secure universal intelligence; because no expense is spared to provide pure water, spacious parks and playgrounds and excellent schools for all its citizens; because its inhabitants cherish and preserve most—if not all—of its buildings, trees and the soil made sacred by the noble men and women of the past; and last, but not least, because it has individuality and self-respect enough to decline to be absorbed in a greater adjacent political unit, preferring to endure higher taxation, if need be, in order to enjoy greater virtue.

Possessing so much that so few other communities in the country have in anything like the same proportion, it is not surprising that the city of Cambridge, Mass., last week rejoiced with much joy at the completion of fifty years of life since the village with its classic fame became a city, now quite as remarkable, if not as well known, as a manufacturing center as it is as seat of learning.

When "The Cambridge Idea" takes root in many other cities their day of civic health will have dawned and a new era in national prosperity as well.

CONGREGATIONALISM AND CONFIRMATION.

We print in another column an article by Dr. Huelster of the Kirchenbote on the subject of Confirmation in a Congregational Church. The rite has a different look and different associations for English and German Christians. It is one of the seven so-called sacraments of the Roman Catholic church which was at first rejected, but afterwards reinstated (though not as a sacrament) by the Lutheran and Reformed churches of Germany, but discarded altogether by the Puritans of England as without trace of Scripture authority and as one of the strongholds of Episcopal control.

As the natural supplement of infant baptism something of the kind has a logical place in church life, the reception of the uninstructed to an initial stage of church membership carrying a larger obligation to instruct and recognize the relation in later years than is often acknowledged in our Congregational churches. If infant baptism is to continue as an essential part of our church practice, it is certainly right that the relation of baptized children to the church should be acknowledged in some other way than by the omission of baptism when they are received into covenant with the church. The reaction from the mistaken experiments of the earlier New England life has certainly gone too far in this direction.

Dr. Huelster calls attention to the existence already of this rite within our denominational bounds, and certainly the Congregational way is broad enough to take in German churches without insisting that they should abandon a custom which has been found useful in the homeland, just as it is broad enough to take in American churches which have discarded infant baptism altogether.

The essential thought, in fact, at the bottom of the confirmation service is one which is recognized by the whole church, though it has not always found practical and sufficient expression. It is that of the responsibility of the church for the training of its children, and the public statement that this training has reached a stage where, with the child's own free consent, the relation of fellowship and responsibility is fully consummated. To call it "entering into covenant with the church" is to look at the same matter from a different side. Nor is even baptism essential, since the children may be recognized in the full sense as wards of the church, to be instructed and guided by it until their essential relation is confirmed by believing baptism.

We have never doubted that the German and Scandanavian elements in our church life would have an influence also upon our church thinking. If their hereditary practice of careful catechetical instruction for the children of the church under the oversight of the church teachers can be grafted upon our present Sunday school system in such a way as to make its religious instruction more efficient, it would be a distinct gain in our church life.

HEAVEN, WHAT IT IS, AND WHERE.

It doubtless is for wise reasons that so little which is definite about heaven has been revealed to us, yet we are not left wholly uninformed. We know that whatever, wherever it may prove to be, it will abound in blessedness and joy, and that the divine presence will be its richest source of happiness. We are told that its delights will more than compensate for all the trials of this life, and that it would be beyond our power at present to appreciate them fully if they were revealed to us.

In one sense heaven probably is a state, a condition, of being. They are in heaven already, in this sense and in some degree, who possess and are cultivating supremely the heavenly spirit, the spirit of purity, love and faith in God. Any place would be heavenly if one there were conscious of the divine presence and favor. The best features of heaven, its holiness and the sacred mutual sympathy between ourselves and between Christ and us are independent of locality. They are not wholly mistaken, then, who claim that heaven is a state of mind and being.

Nevertheless the teaching of the Bible seems to be that heaven is a definite place. It is called the Father's house. It also is spoken of as a city. The language in which it is described seems to be largely figurative, yet presumably we are meant to infer that heaven is more than a condition and is an actual locality. To most of us this renders it more inviting for we like to look forward to being somewhere in particular with Christ and his redeemed saints.

But after all it matters little to know just what and where heaven is provided we know how to reach it. And this we do know certainly. Christ is the door. The way to heaven is through the acceptance, love and service of Jesus Christ, and there is no other. It is not always a perfectly easy way. Sometimes it is quite the opposite. But it is very plain, and the rewards of walking in it are experienced long before heaven itself is attained.

CURRENT HISTORY.

The National Legislature.

The first, and long, session of the Fifty-fourth Congress will have ended, probably, ere this is read. As seems to be inevitable whenever Executive and legislature represent differing party views, the product of important new legislation by this Congress is not large and is even smaller than usual, owing to the peculiar make-up of the Senate and the factions within the dominant party there. Final action on two questions of supreme interest, immigration and uniform legislation governing bankruptcy, has been deferred until the next session. No attempt has been made to face in a statesmanlike way the reformation of our currency system, which if it had been faced and settled years ago would have satisfied the South and West and made impossible their present determination to secure inflation through a resort to the free coinage of silver; bellicose resolutions respecting our relations with Great Britain and Spain have gone rushing through without any adequate debate of the grave issues at stake. There has been no willingness to ignore partisan prejudices or compromise honest convictions in a rational effort to make national income equal national expenditure, and the Senate, by a union of Western Republicans and Southern and Western Democrats and Populists, has voted, thirty-two to twenty-five, to deprive the President and Treasury Department of their present authority to issue bonds whenever in their opinion it becomes necessary, if thereby the credit of the nation may be sustained; and although the House Committee on Ways and Means, by a large majority, has reported adversely upon this Senate proposition, it is by no means as certain as it should be that the House will have an opportunity to vote on the bill and defeat it, for many Congressmen are thinking more now of their own and their party's political future than they are of national welfare or sound finance. It has not been a session creditable to the nation.

The record, when considered by itself, is not as bad as those of some prior Congresses, but it has been such as to force many to wonder whether representative government is not failing to equal the expectations of its friends, and whether party welfare is not considered superior to national health by most of our legislators. Of course, responsibility for this, if it exists, rests, as Dr. Merriman pointed out in his sermon before the Home Missionary Society last week, upon the people who elect such men, and reform must begin among the people. They get what they deserve.

The Veto Power.

No fact is more apparent to one who surveys the course of events in this country during the past two decades than the fact that the executive department of government, in State and nation, has been, and is usually, far more trustworthy and truly representative of the people than the legislative department. Had it not been for Presidents Grant, Hayes and Cleveland the country would long since have repudiated its pledges, ruined its credit abroad, and sunk toward the level of Mexico and China. Governor Greenhalge made a secure place for himself in the hearts of the people of Massachusetts by defying monopolists, place-seekers and bigots who had intimidated or purchased the legislators, and the present acting-governor, Mr. Wolcott, bids fair to be equally indifferent to all but his sworn duty. His latest veto defeats, for a time at least, the attempt of capitalists to secure from the State an irrevocable monopoly, ostensibly granting authority to furnish fuel gas at low rates to the towns and cities in the State, but virtually placing unlimited authority in the hands of men far more interested in bettering their investments in Dominion coal deposits than in conserving the interests of the people.

President Cleveland's recent veto of the River and Harbor Bill has been overridden, as was expected, for that appropriation bill more than any other represents the malign product of log-rolling and the work of legislators who conceive it to be their chief duty to divert funds from the national treasury into their respective congressional districts. But the pregnant fact still remains that the bill calls for expenditures too extravagant for the nation to indulge in at a time like this. President Cleveland's last veto, that of the General Deficiency Bill, and vetoed chiefly because of its Senate amendment authorizing the payment of $1,000,000 for French spoliation claims, has been approved by the House, partisan lines fading away before the force and justice of his argument. In this last message the President well improved the opportunity to answer the weak and amusing arguments recently put forth by men no less eminent than Mr. Sherman of Ohio, that the Executive has no business to veto appropriation bills.

Domestic Politics.

While the exact result of the election held in Oregon last week is not revealed yet, it is apparent that the Republicans have lost in some districts to a combination of Democrats and Populists, and that many of the successful Republicans are advocates of the free coinage of silver in the sixteen to one ratio. The Maine Republican convention, of course, indorsed Mr. Reed's candidacy and took no backward step on the monetary standard issue. It is admitted that the free coinage of silver faction of the Democratic party has won overwhelming victories in the State conventions of Kentucky, Virginia, Kansas, Utah and North Dakota during the past week, and that party is apparently as certain to formulate a free coinage of silver plank in its platform and to nominate a man to match the platform as the Republican party seems certain to nominate Mr. McKinley. Moreover, the effect of the triumph of the free silver faction in the Democratic party and the popular uprising in behalf of silver throughout the South and West is having a demoralizing effect upon some Republican managers and delegates from States that have instructed their delegates to insist upon a sound money or gold platform, and there is danger that what the political managers conceive to be party policy will triumph over principle at St. Louis, unless delegates to the convention from all sound money States are given to understand by principle loving constituents that the day for paltering and evasion on this vital issue is past.

Civil Service Reform, Its Successes and Perils.

Comptroller Roberts of New York State, by his refusal to pay the salaries of the men selected by Mr. Lyman as his subordinates in the enforcement of the Raines law, men whom Mr. Platt forced Governor Morton to place on the non-competitive list, has won a great victory for civil service reform in that State, for his stand for principle, and his evident determination to test the matter in the courts, either shamed or forced Governor Morton into revoking his order placing them on the non-competitive list, and it is now certain that all Excise Commissioner Lyman's agents must be men who have passed the competitive examinations. Mayor Strong of New York city, acting upon the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission of that city, has at one stroke taken 140 officials, with salaries aggregating $318,000 a year, from the "exempt" list and placed them on the competitive schedule. The aldermen and politicians, who live to plunder the city and only remain influential so long as they have patronage to dole out, are weeping and gnashing their teeth, but the Committee of Seventy, the Good Government Clubs and thoughtful citizens are rejoicing over the staggering blow which has been dealt to the spoils system in the metropolis of the nation.

On the other hand, the unwelcome news comes from Washington that the men there whose tenure of office has been made secure by civil service reform legislation are imperiling the perpetuity of the civil service law by their greed and their disposition to pursue a policy of bulldozing the legislators. In other words, department employés in several of the departments are organizing what are virtually powerful trades unions, and are threatening legislators with political death if they do not pass legislation favorable to the employés.

International Arbitration.

Certainly public sentiment in favor of this mode of settling difficulties between nations is increasing. From England come reports of resolutions in favor of it passed by all sorts of influential public gatherings recently, and last week, for the second time in two years, a picked group of American citizens gathered at Lake Mohonk and spent three days in discussing such questions as these: Is a permanent tribunal for the settlement of international controversies desirable and practicable? Should it be urged at first for English-speaking people only, or for other nations also? How shall such a court be constituted? Is any increase of our army, navy or fortifications needed at the present time? What measures can be taken at the present time to develop public opinion in this country in favor of the substitution of law for war in the settlement of international controversies?

When it is stated that such men as Rev. Messrs. S. E. Herrick, Reuen Thomas and Edward Everett Hale, and Robert Treat Paine, George S. Hale, E. D. Mead and Samuel B. Capen of Boston, Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott of Brooklyn, Rev. R. S. MacArthur of New York, Bishop Cyrus D. Foss of Philadelphia, Rev. A. H. Bradford of Montclair, Hons. John A. Kasson and F. S. Gillett, President Warfield of Lafayette College, Judge Robert Earl of the New York Supreme Court, Judge Ashman of Philadelphia and Robert U. Johnson of the Century were present and discussed these questions, ex-Senator George F. Edmunds presiding, it may be understood that those who were present heard great themes treated in a masterly way, and that the platform formulated represents the gleaned wisdom of the debates. Following is the body of the platform. It closes with an assurance to President Cleveland that he can do nothing more honorable or popular than consummating a treaty ushering in a permanent arbitration tribunal; and an appeal to statesmen, clergymen, editors, educators and citizens generally to labor for the desired end.

In the settlement of personal controversies civilization has substituted the appeal to law for the appeal to force. It is high time for a like substitution of law for war in the settlement of controversies between nations. Law establishes justice, war simply demonstrates power. Such a substitution of law for war requires a permanent tribunal to which all nations may appeal. Its personnel may change, but its judicial life should be continuous; its mere existence would often prevent controversy, and its decision would become a recognized interpretation of international law. It would not impair the sovereignty, lessen the dignity nor hazard the honor or safety of any nation. The enforcement of its judgment might be safely left to the moral obligations of the nation concerned, and the moral sentiments of mankind. Such tribunal should be so constituted that all civilized nations may, if they choose, by adhering to the treaty constituting it, avail themselves of its benefits. Disarmament of the nations should follow such recognition of and provision for the reign of reason over the passions of mankind. The facts that during the last year the Inter-Parliamentary Peace Union, containing parliamentary representatives from fourteen European Powers, has formulated a plan for an international tribunal, that France has officially proposed to this country a permanent treaty of arbitration, and that it is semi-officially reported that negotiations are pending between the United States and Great Britain for a similar treaty, justify the belief that the way is now open to create between this country, Great Britain and France and, perhaps, with other Powers also, some permanent system of judicial arbitration as to the essential safeguard of civilization.

If this conference can only generate public opinion enough to induce the great political conventions, soon to be held, to take equally lofty views on the subject a great step forward will be taken, and this platform should be, and probably will be, called to the attention of the platform makers at St. Louis and Chicago.

Mr. Gladstone's Waning Influence.

Two Liberal victories in English by-elections just held are considered as indicative of a reaction against the Tory-Unionist ministry. We hinted a week or two ago that Mr. Gladstone's comment on the relative responsibility of Nonconformists and the Irish Catholics in causing the disturbance within the Liberal party now going on would not please those Nonconformists who suppressed their convictions on the question of sectarian education for many years in order that they might prove loyal to Mr. Gladstone in his effort to secure home rule for Ireland. And now we are called upon to chronicle the fact that Mr. Gladstone's recent letter to Cardinal Ramapolla, expressing the hope that some day Rome and the Anglican Church might be brought nearer together, if not united, has called forth from some of Mr. Gladstone's former most loyal lieutenants, men like Dr. J. Guinness Rogers, Rev. Dr. Charles Berry and Hugh Price Hughes, the most vehement dissent. Dr. Rogers is reported as describing it as "betraying the liberty of the country, a miserable trifling with Rome and an effort to entangle England in the old yoke of bondage."

Premier Rudini of Italy, in his desire to make trouble for his rival and predecessor, Signor Crispi, has permitted the publication of correspondence between Great Britain and Italy relative to the real purpose of the British expedition to the Soudan which never should have seen the light, and Mr. Labouchere and other opponents of the ministry's foreign policy have used this correspondence to good advantage in badgering and humiliating the ministry during recent parliamentary discussions. Italy has practically withdrawn from its contest with Abyssinia, humiliated and woefully outgeneraled. General Baratieri, the commander-in-chief of the Italian forces in Abyssinia, is now undergoing trial by court-martial for failing to succeed, whereas the real responsibility for the failure of the European power rests upon those Italian jingoes who years ago began to stimulate national conceit and forced Italy to enter upon a career as a colonizer in North Africa, at a time when every bit of her revenue was needed to defray legitimate domestic expenditure.

Turkey, Crete and Russia.

The outbreak in Crete has not been suppressed. The revolutionists continue to win in the desultory contests that take place from time to time. Greece is trying to induce the European Powers to force Turkey to hand over Crete to her. But most reliable reports from European capitals do not indicate that Germany, Austria, England and Italy are more concerned with Cretan welfare than they were with Armenian, and Russia is frankly conceded to be the watchdog in the way of anything like a partition of Turkey. There probably will be a gathering of the fleets at Crete and some pressure brought to bear on Turkey to avoid anything like a massacre. Reports from Constantinople indicate that a reign of terror exists there; neither the life nor the property of Christians is being respected or protected and those who plunder or kill go unpunished. All Turks suspected of holding liberal sentiments or plotting against the sultan are living in terror of arrest and extinction, the outbreak in Crete having intensified the zeal of the government in its campaign of suppressing the Young Turk party.

NOTES.

The death of Jules Simon is a distinct loss to France, as he was in many respects her greatest statesman, publicist and citizen. He stood for pure morals and righteousness in a country that sadly needs both, and every worthy cause calculated to conserve good morals found in him a prompt and open adherent. He deplored and fought against the prevalent Sabbath desecration, and never accepted popular ideals in French art and literature.

The sudden and shocking death of Mr. Austin Corbin, in the New Hampshire country town where he was born and where he had built a superb home for himself, removes one who in many ways was a typical American business man. He had force of character and breadth of vision and executive ability such as in past eras would have made him a great political leader or general. But, like so many others of our ablest men, he set himself to developing railroads, improving vast tracts of waste territory and adding to the wealth and comfort of his fellowmen at the same time that he was accumulating a vast fortune for himself.

IN BRIEF.

The sound of the baccalaureate is again heard throughout the land. What a quantity of wise advice is proffered on these June Sundays to the rising generation! If any student hath ears to hear let him hear.

The appearance of the 1896 Year-Book a month earlier than its predecessor in the series gladdens all who have occasion to consult it. It never was so prompt before. Well done, national secretary, scribes and reporters!

One of our contemporaries gives an eloquent account of the observance of Memorial Day in a Massachusetts town. The article opens with a reference to the "scared veterans." Was it the length of the oration or the recollection of the smoke of battle that filled them with terror?

Members of the American Congregational Association should bear in mind the special meeting, advertised on page 943, on next Saturday to take formal action on the new Congregational House and the sale of the old one. In this way a practically settled matter will be formally and effectually consummated.

Our Episcopal friends (it would be cruel to insist upon the "Protestant" in this connection) are waiting, some of them with amusement and some of them, we fear, with apprehension, to see whether Pope Leo will pronounce their orders valid or invalid. We are no prophets, but we are Yankees and may guess, and we guess that the pope will not pronounce them valid, but will offer to make them so—upon certain conditions.

The Boston Unitarians have their South End problem as well as the rest of us, and in the case of one of their churches there they have approached it boldly and in a somewhat novel fashion. This method is nothing less than the induction into the pastorate of a man and his wife, both being duly installed last Sunday, and each being equally capable of filling the pulpit. We shall watch with interest the effect of this plural pastorate.

The solid, profiting quality of the material which the Independent furnishes its readers week by week has always been one of its distinguishing marks, and now that it comes to us with a handsome new dress of type and with some rearrangement of departments it is all the more attractive. Evidently the Independent is not only determined to maintain its place in the very forefront of papers of its class, but it possesses the ability and the resources wherewith to realize high ideals.

Our Pilgrims to England and Holland made an early start last Thursday morning, the Columbia moving out of its dock at Hoboken soon after seven o'clock. The early hour prevented any demonstration on the part of the few who came to wave their good-bys, but it is pleasant to record that these forty or fifty travelers fared forth into the brightest sunshine and with their hearts beating high with anticipation of the pleasures in store. If the steamer makes schedule time they will land in Plymouth this week Thursday, where a reception is to be tendered them by the mayor of the city.

In making assignments of the delegates to the approaching Sunday school convention in this city there has been a call for the extension of hospitalities beyond the four days of the convention. This arises from the fact that certain persons coming from distant sections of the land object to Sunday travel and at the same time desire earnestly to be present at the opening day, Tuesday. In order both to maintain their convictions and gratify their longing to be on hand promptly they must arrive Saturday night of the preceding week. The suggestion has been made that it would be altogether fitting for brethren hereabouts who cherish similar opinions with regard to Sabbath observance to come forward with an offer of hospitality for these extra days. Here, certainly, is a chance for our most extreme Sabbatarian friends to stand by their principles, even though at a little personal inconvenience.

The large number of Congregationalists who remember so pleasantly Dr. Mackennal's visit to this country in 1889 will take pleasure in looking upon the excellent likeness presented on our cover page. His address at the Worcester National Council of that year will be recalled as singularly felicitous, and we have no doubt that he will be among the first of the delegates to be selected by our English brethren to attend the next international council in this city in the course of three or four years. The denomination on the other side of the water has no more useful member than he. He makes a point of attending all the important meetings and is gifted with unusual executive ability. Now that Drs. Dale, Allon and Macfadyen have passed away, Dr. Mackennal is certainly to be numbered among the half-dozen most influential leaders among the Congregational churches of Great Britain. As such, as well as for his own sake, we are glad to make our readers better acquainted with him.

The Springfield Christian Endeavorers follow the First Church in that city in agreeing not to patronize its local baseball club until it ceases when away from home to play professional games on Sunday. There was an earnest discussion of the subject at the meeting of the Endeavor Union last week. Dr. Trask and one or two other local clergymen sympathized with the majority, but took the ground that a boycott was unwise. When the vote was taken, however, only about twenty-five declared against such radical action. A similar controversy has been going on in St. Paul, where, through the efforts of ministers, a compromise has been arranged whereby after certain games already scheduled for several coming Sundays there shall be an abandonment of the practice. We are glad that Christian sentiment is thus making itself felt. A store that keeps open on Sunday forfeits its claim to the week day patronage of Sabbath-keeping people, and why should a ball nine presume to ignore the convictions of the best people in the city whose name it bears?

It is an open secret that, in a few days, President Penrose of Whitman College is to be married. Few have known under what burdens the president has been staggering while seeking to comply with the conditions upon which Dr. D. K. Pearsons's gift could be made available. A year ago Whitman was bankrupt. Today it looks as if a hearty rally, July 5, on the part of its friends and a gift from congregations which as yet have had no hand in helping forward its endowment would secure the $40,000 still needed and release the president for work in the college itself. The following letter to his prospective bride explains itself:

> This note [a note of hand signed by President Penrose] should be kept as a memento. It was given to me for the purpose of paying the mortgage and back pay of the teachers of Whitman College. This debt is now paid and you can present it [the note] to the college when you choose, and I think it should be preserved in a glass case and kept forever. It was a bold move on the part of President Penrose to sign a note of $12,500 when not one cent was in sight to pay it. The note represents the actual poverty of the college when Penrose assumed control. I give the note to you as a wedding present and also as a sample of the faith and courage of your future husband. D. K. Pearsons

Such a princely wedding gift as this is is not only notable in itself, but shows the interest Dr. Pearsons takes in helping others to meet conditions which he deems it wise to impose, or what extra gifts, usually unheralded, he is constantly making. Only those on whose shoulders the burdens of raising a college endowment have rested, increased by the thought of money due hard-worked teachers, can appreciate the sense of relief which has come to the youthful president of this Western college through the above note.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Memorial Day in Chicago.

There has been considerable feeling in Grand Army circles over the tendency manifest for several years to devote Memorial Day to sports of various kinds, and to look upon the decoration of soldiers' graves and the rehearsal of their merits as matters of secondary interest. Manifestoes even have been issued, calling attention to this disregard of the purpose of the day, but, as might have been expected, entirely without effect. Chicago bicyclers arranged to have a race on that day, and by skillful management drew the attention of the public to that. The winner of the race, O. P. Nelson, was "a dark horse," and the wheel on which he rode one of his own manufacture. Fortunately, rival houses can make nothing out of this victory for the sale of their goods. The distance passed over was about twenty-five miles and the time taken a trifle over one hour and twelve minutes.

It must not be supposed that the graves of the heroes were not decorated. The cemeteries seemed to lack no visitors. In the public schools addresses were given on patriotism by men selected and assigned for the purpose. Special addresses in clubs, in armories, at regimental headquarters, as well as in the cemeteries, were also delivered. So far as one can judge from the outward appearance there is no lack of patriotism in this portion of the country, however weak it may seem to be in the vicinity of Washington.

Sunday Schools in Cook County.

Monday morning was devoted by our ministers to the consideration of Sunday schools. The paper by R. E. Jenkins, Esq., the superintendent of the South Church school, brought out the surprising fact that the number of pupils in our Congregational schools in the county has decreased during the past year. This was accounted for in part by the transfer of a large school to the German Lutherans, but this does not account for the whole loss. Probably there would be a difference of opinion as to its cause. It is not likely to occur again. Mr. Jenkins considered especially the management of Sunday schools, and the relation between them and the church. What is needed on the part of the church and especially of its leading members, he thinks, is interest in the school, adequate provision for its support, careful selection of its officers and teachers and constant use of the school as a means through which to reach people outside the church and bring them into sympathy with it. Mr. Jenkins knows but one way to secure scholars—to go after them. One might add that with a superintendent possessing the experience, energy and enthusiasm of Mr. Jenkins, failure in Sunday school work is impossible. An interesting and vivid account, though very brief, was given by President Eaton of Herr Brockelmann of Heidelberg, the Sunday school apostle of Germany.

A report in accordance with instructions given in a resolution of inquiry in regard to the ecclesiastical procedure of the Bay Conference in the case of Rev. C. O. Brown of California was read, which after a brief discussion was laid upon the table. The report, prepared with care, was that the conference had certainly proceeded in accordance with Congregational precedents, but brethren felt, what many felt from the first, that we are too far away from San Francisco to pass intelligent judgment on what has there been done.

Labor Troubles.

Superintendent Walker of the Illinois Steel Works has this week dismissed the 1,500 men employed in them, ostensibly because a few "straighteners" would not work, really without doubt on account of the hardness of the times. Some, claiming to be behind the scenes, say it is because fifty Negroes have been employed by the company between whom and the white laborers there has been constant and even dangerous warfare. The "straighteners," without whom, though few in number, nothing can be done, claim that the foreman unjustly rejected their work and compelled them to do over again that which was already satisfactory. This the company deny. Meanwhile families are suffering and men long unable to secure work are deprived of it again. Were times brisk there is no reason to suppose that these works would have been closed.

The Political Sky.

With us this is cloudy. Neither Republicans nor Democrats can justly claim to be the sole possessors of political virtue. While there is little truth in the general charges brought against John R. Tanner, the Republican nominee for governor, not a few would have preferred some other man in his place. Chicago Democrats just now seem hopelessly divided, although they will probably manage to bury their differences in time to vote the party ticket. But the great question with thoughtful men of both parties is the question of currency. What kind of money are we to have? Populism is felt to be a very serious danger. A declaration for free silver by the national Democratic convention in July may continue the party in power. Not a few old-time Prohibitionists seem ready to vote for free silver. Unless hard money men stand together on a platform which admits of no double interpretation nothing can prevent a currency upheaval which may shatter all our financial institutions and throw the entire country into bankruptcy. That the political caldron is already boiling in such centers as Chicago is not a misfortune. It enables us to perceive the disasters ahead and prepare to meet them. Every day one hears it said, What is needed to restore prosperity is a protective tariff and a sound currency. Give us this and business will be good at once. It is bad enough now, as all our benevolent institutions know to their sorrow.

Delayed Justice.

At last Elijah P. Lovejoy, the martyr of free speech, is to have a monument worthy his heroic character. He was murdered, it will be remembered, at Alton, Ill., Nov. 7, 1837, for daring to discuss the rights of men in the columns of his paper. Authorized by the legislature, the contract for a monument in his memory, which will cost about $25,000, has just been let. The monument is to be completed by early in 1897.

The Pastor of the Church Militant.

With the best of intentions Rev. John Rusk has brought himself into trouble. Unwise advisers seem to have led him to take measures which he was not prepared to carry out and to bring persons into court against whom he could not quite establish the charges which he had made. If there is no probability that Dr. Rusk has done anything morally wrong, he has unfortunately laid himself open to criticisms which may, for a time, hinder his usefulness and give him annoyance. Possibly ministers whose hearts are set on purifying society through processes of law, as well as through their sermons, would do well not to be over hasty in making arrests of persons reputed to be guilty of immoral conduct.

The Coliseum.

This building, said to be the largest exhibition building in the world, was occupied for the first time Monday night, June 1, Buffalo Bill giving one of his unique shows. The arena is 600 feet in length by 160 in width. This is 200 feet longer than one of our city blocks. There are two permanent galleries. The first, or balcony, is twenty-five feet above the level of the main floor and is forty feet deep. The second, forty feet above the main floor, is twelve feet deep. The hight of the building is 100 feet inside and its entire length, on the outside, 676 feet. Ample vestibules and corridors have been provided. The audience room can be arranged for 1,000 or for 50,000 persons. The roof has been built in terraces and is supported by trusses, as was the roof of the Manufactures Building at the World's Fair. It will be remembered that the building fell last year while in the process of erection. Although of solid materials, chiefly steel, some anxiety has been felt about its safety even now. The building has been completed thus early in the season in order that its safety may be tested before the Democrats use it for their National Convention in July.

Departures for Europe.

Dr. Simeon Gilbert, so well known to the readers of The Congregationalist as a correspondent from Chicago, has already sailed. He has a paper before the Grindelwald Conference. He will be absent three or four months. His wife and daughter accompany him. Rev. Q. L. Dowd, also a former correspondent of this paper, has left for Europe. He will make the journey through Great Britain and on the Continent upon his wheel. Dr. F. A. Noble sails June 12, and Professor Mackenzie and his family have already gone. With these forerunners of our summer travelers go our best wishes.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

The Springfield Republican believes that "the Democratic party ought to be disrupted if it is no longer able to meet the essential conditions of party service on the most vital issue of the time. Men who hold opposite opinions on the most important question of politics ought not to be bound together in action. Let parties follow opinions, not opinions parties. There is enough of tyranny in majorities, when all the votes are counted, without having your views stifled by minorities. We say, then, let the silver Democrats and the gold Democrats flock by themselves, if they will; it will bring the great issue of the day to the front and give the people a chance to express an opinion upon it. Principles before parties!"

Prof. H. C. Vedder of Crozier Theological Seminary, formerly editor of the Examiner and a high authority as a historian of the Baptist denomination, commenting in the Examiner on the fuss which not a few Baptists are making because of Dr. Whitsitt's article on Baptists in Johnson's Encyclopædia, in which Dr. Whitsitt shatters somewhat the belief that immersion has always been practiced by Baptists, says: "I may be wrong, but there seems to me to be woeful ignorance regarding what are fundamental Baptist principles among those who are teachers in Israel. Immersion is neither fundamental nor distinctive among the principles of Baptists, and to treat it as such is to lose sight of our real principle and weaken our position unspeakably. What Baptists stand for, above everything else, is a religion of the spirit as distinguished from a religion of rites, and hence for a church composed of those, and of those only, who give credible evidence that they have been regenerated by the Spirit of God. Our affinities, in the past and in the present, are with those Christians who hold this principle, not with those who immerse. . . . These things are the very A B C of Baptist principles and Scripture teaching; but if there were not dense and widespread ignorance concerning them, it would be impossible for anybody to get excited over Dr. Whitsitt's opinions regarding questions of historic fact, that have no bearing on the teaching of the New Testament and our obedience to it." The Watchman makes practically the same assertion: "Immersion is only a single corollary from the two principles that are really cardinal with us, namely, the supreme headship of Christ and the supremacy of the Scriptures as the rule of faith and practice. There are other corollaries which come closer to the heart of our life, such as a regenerate church and soul liberty."

ABROAD.

The Japan Mail (May 2) says that while no treaty between Russia and Japan respecting the future of Korea has been concluded or will be, it admits that an entente has been established by which the two Powers agree to act in concert for the purpose of preserving order in Korea. How the compact will eventuate the Mail does not predict, but it sees great gains in that ominous complications have been dispelled, temporarily at least, and Korea will no longer be able to evade reform by invoking the jealousies of rival powers.

Rev. Dr. J. G. Rogers's interpretation of the vote on the second reading of the Education Bill, in which it was revealed that the Irish Roman Catholics had joined the Anglican Tories and Liberal Unionists to force sectarian education on British taxpayers, as stated in The Independent, is this: "It ends the alliance which carried the Home Rule Bill of 1893, and it is not easy to see how it is to be reconstructed. Our complaint of the Irish members is not that they deserted those who had made such costly sacrifices in their cause, but that they have been unfaithful to the principle for which we and they have contended. This Education Bill affects England only. Why not have distinctly recognized this and dealt with it on home rule principles? They have chosen the other course, and Nonconformists will then ultimately have no need to regret it." The London Chronicle thus describes the result which will follow the enactment of the bill: "It means that bitterness, barrenness and all uncharitableness are to be installed as a permanent part of our school system. It means that the most precious and hopeful of all our institutions is to be thrown into the melting pot of sectarianism, that the expansion of education is to be deliberately stopped, that the school boards are to be harassed and pilloried for the offense of having properly discharged the noblest of duties, for the crime of having succeeded where the church has failed."

Rev. Alexander Mackennal, D. D.

His Personality and His Opinions on Live Themes.

By the English Representative of The Congregationalist.

Dr. Mackennal's geniality is not of the kind that gushes and forgets; it is the overflow of a deep, kindly, generous nature. As soon as you enter "Beechwood," his home, you feel yourself in the midst of a full and rich family life. His books, pictures, household goods, conversation, show that he moves in no narrow groove. The keynote of his character is catholicity. If he has not loomed in the public gaze quite so largely as Dr. Dale and Dr. Rogers — both of whom at points he resembles—it is partly because of his broad tolerance, his ability to see things from his opponent's standpoint as clearly as from his own, his reticent nature, and his utter indifference to mere popularity. He is better imaged by a broad, calm lake, a reservoir of power, or a strong, deep, silent, smoothly flowing river, than by an impetuous, turbulent stream. It takes you some time to get to know Dr. Mackennal, but your admiration grows as you discover the wide range of his abilities, his steadiness and singleness of aim, his firmness of reasoned conviction, his moral virility, his general solidity of character. Going to Bowdon, eight miles from Manchester, in 1877, there he has since remained, his powers maturing, his influence extending, his church work prospering, and his congregation growing more and more attached to their pastor. For quiet, solid influence throughout the Congregational body Dr. Mackennal is unsurpassed by any of his brethren. For a quarter of a century he has been intimately associated with every denominational movement and shown active interest in the wider issues of Nonconformity.

Born in Cornwall, sixty years ago, Alexander Mackennal was educated in London. Henry Irving was one of his schoolfellows. "I remember him well," the Doctor remarked, as we sat chatting in his ample, orderly, comfortable study. "As a boy he was not a great reciter. Every Christmas we had a public entertainment, but Irving did not take a leading part."

"Did he not show some sign of his future distinction as an actor?"

"Only by his great love for the art, though I remember seeing him in his mother's house (we visited each other) with exactly the curious walk he now has. The special melodramatic power he has since displayed requires for its full manifestation greater intensity than a boy possesses."

Bowdon, the pleasantest suburb of Manchester, is remarkably healthy. It stands high, and the soil to a depth of 200 feet is clean sand. It is on the outskirts of Altrincham, a market town of about 10,000 inhabitants, mentioned in Peveril of the Peak. The church of which Dr. Mackennal is pastor was founded fifty years ago. Dr. Mackennal is a sort of Nonconformist bishop. He has a pastoral assistant and five evangelists, who have charge of mission centers in the district—the six congregations forming one church. As the attractiveness of Bowdon tells against the Manchester churches, Dr. Mackennal's people, who are tolerably wealthy, seek to restore the balance by helping to support four missions in the city. He took a leading part in the founding of Mansfield College, Oxford, and succeeded Dr. R. W. Dale as chairman of its council and educational board. He was secretary of the colleges reform committee during the nine years in which it successfully aimed to bring the Congregational colleges into closer co-operative union. This work brought him prominently before the notice of his brethren, who in 1887 elected him to the chair of the union. On the death of Dr. Hannay he was invited to the secretariat, and, as Americans know, he was secretary of the International Congregational Council. With the exception of Dr. Rogers, he is now the oldest member of committee. Than Dr. Mackennal there is no better authority on the internal development of British Congregationalism in recent years.

When discussing schemes of reunion Dr. Mackennal has always favored the idea of union between Presbyterians and Congregationalists. "I prefer the Congregational method," he told me, "but I don't look upon it as essential to a Christian church. Whichever method is adopted should be employed thoroughly. I regard the combination of the Congregational and Presbyterian systems as impracticable."

"Should not Christian unity be sought rather along the line of federation than organic union?"

"It was that belief that led to the formation of the Free Church Congress. The discussion of the reunion question at the International Congregational Council excited great interest. Every speaker not only affirmed the spiritual union that underlies all denominational differences, but declared also that this identity of spirit ought to be practically expressed in increased co-operative action."

"The aim of the federation movement," Dr. Mackennal explained, "is not to construct a new church that shall absorb all the different religious bodies, but rather to encourage the denominations to unite for common action. Reunion is not in our program, and I should say that no active member of the council believes that it will come up as a practical question within the lifetime of any living man."

"Grindelwald?"

"The first of Dr. Lunn's conferences was held after the Manchester congress, but there was no connection between the two. I went to Grindelwald and Lucerne not believing that reunion is at present possible, but assured that it is advantageous for members of different communions to meet and be frank, not so much in their criticism of one another, though I do not object to that, as in affirming their own polities. My anticipation that such a course would engender mutual respect and admiration, and perhaps, by the by, bring about reunion so far as it is advisable, has been considerably realized, but attempts to do more than that have signally failed."

Dr. Mackennal went on to point out that the Free Church Congress and Grindelwald are but symptoms of a general tendency among Christians of all denominations to come into closer relations, as a result of the growing recognition of their unity in essentials. "This is as noticeable between some Anglicans and Nonconformists as it is between Free Church ministers of different persuasion. I say some; the desire is not as common in the one case as in the other, but where it exists it is as true."

Touching the vexed education problem, Dr. Mackennal observed that since 1870, when the present system — the "compromise" between Anglicans and Nonconformists—came into vogue, the attitude of Congregationalists and Baptists has greatly changed. "It was in deference to what we believed to be the conscientious objections of a large portion of the people that we advocated the secular system, but we have found that the bulk of the nation prefer Bible teaching and some sort of devotional service, and our position is modified accordingly. In the present controversy the real point at issue is whether the primary regard of the national system of education shall be the well-being of the nation or of the churches. Personally I do not object to the denominational scheme — uniform secular education, with religious instruction according to the wishes of the parents —as a supplement to the school board or national system. But I would insist upon every school that is aided by public money being placed under effective representative control. With that safeguard I would leave a great deal to the schoolmaster, but nothing to clerical managers."

In theology Dr. Mackennal may be described as a broad evangelical. Liberal-minded and fully abreast of current thought, he yet recognizes Christ as being a great deal more than simply an authoritative teacher. "I believe very distinctly in the objective character of Christ's work. I believe he has achieved redemption for mankind by his incarnation, suffering and death. I also believe in the reality of the work of the Holy Ghost, not only in the quickening of the individual believer, but also in the illumination and guidance of assemblies of Christian people." In reply to a question the Doctor said he does not regard the miraculous birth of Christ as essential. "Whether Luke's narrative is historical, or whether it is to be taken as representing the belief of the primitive church, in either case it is a witness of the acceptance of the real deity of the Lord Jesus Christ as an article of belief in the churches, and that to me is the essential thing."

Dr. Mackennal's published works include Christ's Healing Touch, a volume of sermons memorial of his Surbiton ministry; The Life of Christian Consecration, the object of which is to supplement the sentimentalism of perfectionism with doctrinal and ethical teaching; The Biblical Scheme of Nature and Man; Sermons from a Sickroom; Life of Dr. Macfadyen and The Story of the English Separatists. The Seven Churches in Asia, considered as types of the religious life of today, has met with a very cordial reception.

For a month this advertisement boldly rivaled theater placards in the down-town district of Kansas City. Its antecedents and sequel furnish a suggestive chapter in recent records of applied Christianity. Like many of its neighbors, our First Church found itself, a few years ago, in a region drained of its historic constituency by rapid suburban transit. Unlike some of its neighbors, it decided to abide in changed surroundings rather than abandon the vicinity for a more fashionable locality. Its beloved pastor, Rev. Henry Hopkins, D. D., has stayed with his people, despite urgent invitations to congenial fields free from such perplexing problems, and the members of the church, though widely scattered, are loyally standing by him in the new conditions of labor.

A prominent factor in solving the problem has been an afternoon Sunday school at three o'clock. While in no sense regarded as a mission, in distinction from the school which still meets as formerly at noon, it naturally gathers scholars from the neighboring homes of the manual laborers, where the waking hour of Sunday morning comes specially late. For the girls who are thus reached a kitchen garden and an industrial school have done grand work. This is in the hands of the Ladies' Union, an organization which cares for all of woman's distinctive work in this church, ably assisted by a lady missionary. But what should be done to reach and hold the street gamins, the bootblacks, the newsboys, who fairly swarm in the vicinity? To this question Mr. J. H. Denison, now in charge of an important down-town church in New York city, addressed himself when he came for a year's associate pastorate of the church. The details of the work under his special direction are given with some minuteness to illustrate what may be accomplished with slight expenditure of money or mechanical appliances.

Starting with the most intelligent and reliable boys in the Sunday school, two clubs, entirely distinct, were organized. The first, the "A. R. T.," consisted of twelve boys, a few in the public schools, but most working in stores or shops, who formed a secret society, for "literary, social and philanthropic" ends, making much of elocutionary exercises, holding their meetings privately one week and publicly the next, giving such simple entertainments as Mrs. Jarley's waxworks and shadow pantomimes, and furnishing such games as air pistols, ring-toss and crokinole. Another club was musical in its aim, consisting wholly of Italians of the better class. They named themselves after a famous New Yorker, "the MacAlisters," scorning the despised "dagoes," except sometimes to secure servile labor from them.

Besides the mutual fun and profit the public performances of these clubs proved attractive, drawing in many newcomers from an exceedingly rough class, who, so far as possible, were induced to come into the Sunday school. Great difficulty, however, was soon experienced in bringing the boys together. The older refused to mingle with the younger, and the various grades and cliques in boy society revealed themselves with an almost ludicrous elaborateness. It was accordingly felt that something more extensive and miscellaneous must be attempted. Being without the place or means for organizing a Boys' Brigade, yet recognizing a boy's fondness for anything smacking of militarism, a plan of four Sunday evening services was devised and widely announced in the handbill, which is given herewith verbatim et literatim.

There was no trouble in securing audiences, and of precisely the kind desired. The restriction upon "little kids," while not too rigidly enforced, gave the impression that this was no babyish affair, and the boys enjoyed keenly the presentation of their tickets and the punching out of the date, upon which they scrupulously insisted. This entitled them to reserved seats in front. Some older persons attended, including fathers and mothers, and the attendance averaged between four and five hundred, despite one severely stormy evening when 150 boys braved the drenching rain, some of them walking two miles. The order of exercises was most carefully adapted to the tastes of the audiences. The military band, in full uniform, opened with a stirring march. The boys then rose and repeated together the Lord's Prayer and joined in some vigorous song like Onward, Christian Soldiers! The band would next play some sacred air like Nearer, My God, to Thee, after which Dr. Hopkins would speak ten or fifteen minutes upon the subject for the evening. More music, both instrumental and vocal, would follow; then Mr. Denison would speak upon the stereopticon pictures, which would follow in general lines the outline of the evening's thought.

Under "enlistment" came views of Israel departing from Egypt and preparing to conquer Canaan; "the drill" introduced that favorite of all boyish souls, David, in his youthful training for the battle with Goliath; "the fight" was illustrated with pictures of some of the world's great battles, and with the story of Elijah in his great contest with the priests of Baal. These talks covered a wide latitude, and offered large scope for practical suggestions, as, for example, the picture of an Oriental smoking a nargileh gave an excellent opening for discussing the injurious effect of cigarettes. For the most part, excellent order prevailed. It was different from the traditional Sunday school concert assembly in that it was perilous to address questions to the listeners, or even allow interpolations, as was seen in the discussion of drilling, when the boys were exhorted to prepare carefully for future responsibility, such as being President of the United States, like Grover Cleveland, one voice being heard very vociferously: "If I couldn't do better'n him today, I wouldn't try!" The roughest of the gamins, however, showed himself susceptible to pathos, and all were very quiet when a touching story was told them of a London waif's life and death.

The results of these special meetings were distinctly cheering. There has been first of all a strengthening of the afternoon Sunday school, which has been one objective point of the entire undertaking, the number in attendance rising from about 150 to a maximum of over 400; and while this has been promoted by faithful pastoral work from Mr. Denison and a system of captains, chosen among the boys to look after new scholars and the attendance of old ones in assigned districts, the special work among the boys had its part. There was also a noteworthy increase in attendance upon the evening preaching services from the homes represented by these boys.

After the special meetings the club work took more extensive form. A large hall on the ground floor not far from the First Church was placed at the disposal of the work by the owner of one of our daily papers, and this was in use every week day evening. By the payment of twenty-five cents any boy could secure a ticket entitling him to the use of this hall on certain evenings. A beginning was made in the line of games and a library and reading-room. On Monday and Thursday evenings a class in composition met, the avowed object of which was to train boys to write for the daily papers, an idea which strongly appeals to their imagination. On Wednesday evening those over fifteen years of age had the privileges of the hall, and were sometimes permitted to bring their "lady friends." Saturday evening was for the boys under fifteen. On Friday evening came a rehearsal of entertainments—elocutionary, literary or dramatic—when the boys brought for inspection and trial anything which they wished to "perform," and on each Tuesday evening there was a public entertainment of such productions as passed muster on the rehearsal evenings. One night the "A. R. T.'s" took possession of the stage, and another night the "MacAlisters," and the regular members of the club had special invitation tickets at their disposal for their friends and members of their families.

The noteworthy element in this boys' work lies in its simplicity, its gradual development, and its close connection with the regular spiritual work of the church. It has advanced with a minimum of cash expenditure and mechanical appliance, and with a large amount of personal effort and increasing responsibility placed upon the boys themselves for their own entertainment.

Since Mr. Denison's departure the responsibility has been directly assumed by the Brotherhood of the Helping Hand, which seeks to learn and put in practice the best methods of help for neglected city boys, with the intention of developing the club and a Boys' Brigade and any other agencies which may seem feasible. This brotherhood is composed of some of the most active men in the First Church, whose spirit is well expressed in the closing paragraph of their pledge, "In this undertaking we promise God and one another to stand together in close and loving brotherhood for the Master's sake, and to work as we pray for the coming of his kingdom." The later development of the work has specially emphasized military drill, in which much enthusiasm has been awakened and proficiency attained. Weekly entertainments of a musical and literary character, in which outside talent of high order has been gladly offered, have also brought to the boys both pleasure and profit.

THE STORY OF A GREAT VICTORY.

BY REV. D. O. MEARS, D. D., ALBANY, N. Y.

A brilliant and close-contested campaign has been fought through the legislature of New York. Leading men of both parties were divided upon its merits. It was purely a moral question asserting itself among statesmen and politicians. Twelve years ago a law was enacted requiring temperance instruction in our schools. For eleven years our boards of education practically ignored its meaning. In 1895 the church and temperance organizations flooded the legislature with nearly a million petitions for the enactment of a more specific law with penalty. Under the leadership of the New York Central Committee, grandly assisted by Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, the great work was done.

The head of the department of instruction began immediately a warfare against the measure then become a law. By skillful tactics several superintendents and educators gave their names to his plans. The intensity of discussion finally resulted in a conference between the temperance forces led by Drs. John Hall, C. L. Thompson and others, with Superintendent Skinner and those in sympathy with his ideas. Some eight or ten conferences were held, resulting in an agreement upon certain phrases to be incorporated into the present law explaining its misunderstood interpretations.

This so-called "compromise" was presented by one of the department of instruction before the committee of Assembly and Senate. During the final meetings of the conference committee Superintendent Skinner was compelled to leave the State, binding himself to agree to whatever terms his colleagues should formulate in committee. These colleagues made their report before the legislative committee.

Judge of the surprise of all when, a few days after presenting their own bill, these same men suddenly proposed another bill, removing every safeguard in the present law. Voluminous pamphlets and circulars were issued, school superintendents traveled near and far, some of them. Whence came the moneys necessary is not our question.

The Assembly committee was favorable to temperance legislation; the Senate committee was in majority opposed. Continued hearings gave large opportunities to the opposition, but still the truth was not suppressed. During all this while the guiding hand was that of Mrs. Mary H. Hunt. No more skillful tactics or far-reaching plans were ever made. Calm, dignified, alert, this noble woman represented admirably the distinguished central committee who gave her full power. Word was freely circulated that antagonism rested in the old and exploded lie that she was interested financially in the books upon hygiene and physiology. Modern gallantry in certain men expressed itself as determined to defeat Mrs. Hunt, inasmuch as she belonged to another commonwealth. The nervous strain upon her was seen in a weariness upon her face. Night and day the "Literary Headquarters" were a center of intense and faithful toil. Here was a philanthropist giving her leisure and wealth without pay enough to support her secretary. She told the legislative committee that she was before them to represent the sixteen million children of the land. Coming years will write her one of the greatest philanthropists.

The perfidy of those who broke their own agreement only made her strength more manifest. Attempted legal delays in the Senate quickened her plans to get the bill out of committee. As weeks went on the kindness of many in Assembly and Senate greeted her. Without shadow of boldness in planning many true men of the legislature gave her their respect and their valuable help. Messages reached her from several most distinguished in position and authority. News from Congress announced at a critical time that the national Government stood by her work in holding all Government schools under this same law.

The first register of her success and the people's wishes came April 15, when the Assembly, by a vote of ninety-eight to twenty-one, supported her work. Congratulations were the order of the day. Party whips could not keep back the best wishes of scores of legislators. Speaker Fish had proved himself a warm friend of the measure so deeply affecting the children and youth. The leader of the Democratic party was equally interested. A senator, now out of sight, once said: "Morals have no place in politics," but under the magnificent pile of carved granite, among politicians exceptionally alert, morals had won the day.

The Senate committee, by majority, attempted to smother the action of the Assembly. A notice served by Senator White served to bring the bill out of committee. In an hour's discussion the intense importance of this method of temperance work was evident. Tuesday, April 21, was set for vote on admitting the bill to its third reading. Senator Malby moved the substitute bearing his name, a bill defeating the whole measure. But Senator White, in a strong speech, answered every point of importance. Mrs. Hunt gave immediate corrections of false statements to those supporting the bill. Quietly the decision neared its moment of being registered, when good morals hung upon the defeat of the substitute by a vote of twenty-three to fourteen. The bill on its third reading waiting its turn came up again on Thursday, 23d.

It was a crowded list of bills ordered to the third reading that day. The morning session came and went. Recess was followed by a second session. At six o'clock the title of the bill was read, and the sonorous voice of the lieutenant-governor announced, "Call the roll on the passage of the bill," with the result of thirty-one in its favor to fourteen against. The voice of the people in the interests of intelligent morals was true; legislators did their part well. The bill passed up to Governor Morton, who, on May 26, gave Mrs. Hunt the pen that made the hard fought enactment the law of the Empire State. It was a great victory in which motherhood was well represented. It is becoming evident that temperance instruction in the schools is bearing its fruit. Vigilance on the part of its friends is the price of safety. The attack seems impending through the boards of education and medical associations, so far as possible. Supported as it is by world renowned experts in each of these departments, it will yet be possible to find those who for some reason are ready to rank themselves with the advocates of toleration, even touching the highest interests of children and youth. The republic owes a debt of gratitude to Mrs. Hunt in her heroic work to defeat the enemies of the broadest education of our children and youth. The Empire State has held the fort against the onslaught by overwhelming force. Good citizenship cannot exist except as the rising generation is guarded from hurtful attacks by those who fatten upon the weaknesses of youth and manhood.

ON THE WING THROUGH ITALY.

BY H. A. B.

If my final verdict on the Italian country and people is, as it is, a favorable one, the outcome is in nowise due to the character of the reception accorded me, for the customs officers did their best to cultivate in me a deep-seated grudge against the entire system of governmental administration. In the innocence of my heart I had brought from America a loaf of homemade bread for a certain New England deacon of my acquaintance, whose prolonged stay abroad had produced a great aversion for the "staff of life" in the ossified form in which it is found all over the Continent. But my benevolent intention was completely wrecked when the lynx-eyed officials pounced upon the tin box incasing the bread, drew it forth, smelt of it, tasted it, weighed it and then demanded three francs to insure its entrance into the country. Not content with this extortion and with putting upon me the imputation of being a professional smuggler, the officials then sent me to another port of entry a few yards distant, where an additional franc was filched from me in order to allow the bread to enter the city of Naples.

To cap this series of affronts these puttering Italians refused to take their own money in payment, obliging me to institute a rapid search among my fellow-passengers for the loan of sufficient English money to satisfy the claims. By this time my filial affection and my good temper were reduced to a minimum and I resorted to the only means of relief at hand. Gathering up the loaf, which had brought me so much woe, I was upon the point of enjoying the exquisite satisfaction of casting it into the Mediterranean. Just at this juncture a porter, who had been trying to act as a mediator between me and my persecutors, influenced no doubt by the expectation of reward, besought me to give him the bread, and that night an Italian family feasted on a foreign delicacy. Meanwhile a salutary lesson had been learned as to the unwisdom of trying to transport American edibles to Italian shores.

It is impossible, however, to be out of sorts with one's self or the world in such an environment as Naples affords. The beautiful bay, the lovely islands of Capri and Ischia, the differing but unrivaled charms of Pompeii and Vesuvius dissipa e from him who will open his mind to their influence all sense of wrong or weariness. And as for the Italian cities themselves—Naples, Rome, Florence, Genoa, Milan and Venice, teeming with treasures gathered in many climes, representing the travail and the achievements of the ages—who can transfer to another an adequate sense of their beauty and glory?

The best short article ever written about the Imperial City was published several years ago by Frederick Harrison in the English Fortnightly. The analysis which he there makes of the three main interests which present themselves in Rome is applicable to some extent to the Italian peninsula as a whole. Antiquity, art and the church—these three great forces and their embodiments rise perpetually before one. Nor do you have to be an expert in any of these directions to appreciate and profit by them. Though Italy has always been a magnet to scholars and artists, to poets and antiquarians, the average man whose purpose in traveling is general broadening is susceptible to the various influences that have their home there.

At Rome you come closest to the ancient world. Dismantled Coliseum and prostrate Forum, gray obelisks and weatherbeaten monuments speak of the days that are very far away, and stir the imagination to reconstruct, if possible, the past, to bring back the times of Cæsar and Cicero, and the still more distant periods, bathed in the mist of tradition. Yet, suggestive as these broken fragments are of the splendor of other days, they stir the heart to sadness. What, for instance, is Hadrian's Villa but a witness to the selfishness and pride and vaulting ambition of man; a monument also to man's fury and hate? The noble structures which one conqueror of the earth reared for his own glory and pleasure another, who succeeds to his estate, ruthlessly demolishes in order to gratify his thirst for conquest. Thus it was that Christians tore down what pagans set up, and pagans in turn again destroyed objects sacred to the Christian heart.

Something of this same sense of human folly and wickedness pursues one who enters the region of art, for here again the traces of the destroyer are only too apparent. What has been preserved to us that marks the flowering of Greek and early Roman art is a mere trifle compared with what has been buried and broken. Enough, however, escaped the fury of the inconoclast to enable us to judge the Golden Age and to serve as models and inspirations to latter day wielders of brush and chisel. The Dying Gladiator, the Marble Faun, the Venus de Medici link this age to all that was finest and most inspiring in the ages gone. To roam through the galleries of the Italian cities is to have every particle of artistic feeling in one quickened and enriched. And a half a day in the Vatican or the Florentine galleries is sufficient reward for crossing the ocean. To stand before the canvas on which the hands of Angelo and Raphael and others of that brilliant galaxy have wrought so wondrously and enduringly is to gain new strength for all one's working days.

The Italy of today, as well as the Italy of art and of antiquity, rewards the attention of the traveler. The picturesque, swarming life of the great cities obtrudes itself whether he will or no. From the heel of the peninsula to the Alps there are few breaks in the procession of beggars. The businesslike way in which they display their deformities shows that they understand what constitutes the best working capital if one would engage in commercial pursuits in Italy today. Like all desirable vocations the profession is somewhat overcrowded and so some of the growing youth have to resort to the next most profitable employment—cab driving. The name of this occupation would not betray to a greenhorn its real character. Nominally, it consists in guiding through narrow streets a rack-a-bones of a horse attached to a vehicle which either has or has not seen better days. But practically it is a species of perpetual warfare with and preying upon the rest of the human race. "Every man my foe, every man, and particularly every American, fair game"—that seems to be Cabby's succinct and animating creed. Physicists say that nothing once in existence is ever lost and so I suppose in this way the spirit of brigandage is preserved to the world, though it is far less romantic to be robbed daily and systematically by these dark-visaged owners of peripatetic ambushes for the unwary than to be held up by rollicking freebooters in the good old Robin Hood fashion.

Now and then a hardy American, galled to the quick by the petty extortions practiced upon him, turns upon his persecutor, declares that he is standing for a principle and professes his willingness to go to jail rather than pay the extra franc which was not in the bargain. Then ensues a violent colloquy in which Cabby, the hotel porter, and the gens d'armes, called in as referee, participate, the American being decidedly at a disadvantage owing to his lack of fluency in the Italian tongue. The affair usually ends in a so-called "compromise," in which the compromise accrues altogether to the advantage of Cabby, the American concluding, when he cools down, that he is too much in a hurry after all to stand for principle. Thus it is that the swindling process goes on and will continue until some Cromwell, some John Brown will go over to Italy and take time enough "to stand for principle," even to the extent of going to jail or possibly to the stake. My private opinion, however, is that the rest of us would be just as badly cheated the next day after the execution as before. But, fortunately, not all the Italian people are in the cab business, so we ought not to consider the class which I have described as necessarily representative of the nation.

At any rate there is one source of satisfaction to which the Italian tourist can always turn when disgusted with himself and his fellowmen. The Italian country itself—its lakes, its plains, its mountains, its encircling seas, its sky, its atmosphere—throws the spell of its charm over the heart. Whether you drive along those matchless roads that overlook the Bay of Naples, or wander through the Borghese gardens, or the Medici Villa at Rome, or whether quaint Tivoli, perched upon the Sabine Hills and commanding wide views of the blue Campagna, lures you to take the ascending journey through the olive groves, or whether you stand on Fiesole's hights and gaze upon the smiling fields that stretch away to the Arno and to the gates of Florence, you find the face of nature very fair. And then the Pallavicini Villa at Genoa, with its sylvan walks and fairy lakes, and the glimpse of Lakes Como and Lugano as the train speeds on toward the St. Gothard, and Venice—ah, but one must not run on forever even with Italy as a theme.

HAMPTON'S STEADY ADVANCE.

BY MARY R. HAMLIN.

Year after year the kind readers of this paper are asked to contribute funds for the education of the Negro and Indian at Hampton. If all who contribute could have been on the school grounds for May 21 and 22 they would have seen the results of this benevolence. A tour around the buildings showed good work in many lines. The classroom exhibits proved that the students have to use eye and hand in their work. The graduation exercises, as usual, were distinguished for their directness and simplicity. The listeners were not bored with secrets of Napoleon's success or the analysis of Plato's mind, but were told instead of What Retards the Progress of the Negro, Hampton's Worth to the Negro, of Life with the Tuscarora Indians in New York State, of the Value of Mechanical Arts in the Development of the Negro, and of whether he was to choose North or South for the field of labor.

Some of the straws showing the drift of mind in the outgoing class are as follows: "Make home a place the child would gladly go to—not run away from." "Mothers of colored girls ought to be careful where their daughters go, when they go and with whom they go." "There is a burden upon each one of us, what awaits each one cannot be done by any other." "Is the Negro physically and mentally capable of mechanical attainments? If we cannot answer this question let us not lay the blame upon our parents, upon their servitude or upon our color, but to ourselves." "When I arrived at Hampton I had no education and no trade, I was an unproductive consumer."

Fourteen trade certificates were presented by Dr. McKenzie to those who had completed courses in dressmaking, tailoring, carpentry and the machine shop. After the presentation of diplomas by Mr. Ogden, president of the board of trustees, to twenty-four colored and five Indian young men and women, came an eloquent speech from Mr. Booker T. Washington, the school's distinguished alumnus. He told of the right solution of the Negro problem, as he believed, according to "Hampton's way and God's way," "the way of putting thought into action, of transmuting mental training into corn, potatoes and horses," "the way also to return justice for injustice, right for wrong, obedience for lawlessness, thrift for laziness" A conference followed on Friday, to discuss various economical, sociological and educational phases of the field. Four topics received special attention.

If Northerners would only follow these alumni home, watch their work at anvil, plow and bench, see the transformation of the one-roomed cabin into the two-storied house, taste the bread and the meat which replaces the "fried pork," look at the neatly dressed, happy wives and children of the communities where General Armstrong "being dead yet speaketh," they would feel that the work must go on, and that Negroes can still say, as they once did to President Lincoln, "We'se a-rising."

When we plead for arbitration we do not necessarily deny that war has its greatness, and that out of it may come permanent good for the great forces of human society. But we also know that to produce war, with a belligerent public policy deliberately to produce war, can only be compared to deliberately and by intention introducing a pestilence into the population, in order, forsooth, that thousands of victims should have the opportunity of dying bravely and with resignation, and that some noble souls—nurses, doctors, mothers—should have the opportunity to develop and display heroic qualities.—President Eliot of Harvard.

The Religiousness of Common Life.*

By Prof. George Adam Smith.

[Num. 21: 17, 18.] In Eastern life there is no drudgery like the drudgery of drawing water. A hundred proverbs call the well the gift of God. But God's gifts are never made by man his own save through hard toil, and this, to an Eastern people, the chief of them all, costs more sweat and weariness than any. Hewers of wood and drawers of water is the Bible name for serfs of the lowest class. Today ask water of any of the figures that stoop over the well-mouth, and it will not be the face of a Rebekah which turns up to you with eyes as sparkling as the water in her jar, but the face of a very weary woman like her whose first prayer to Christ was: "Sir, give me this water, that I thirst not neither come hither to draw." The long tramp to the well, the weary waiting for one's turn, the strain of lifting the heavy bucket from the deep pool, the climb home again with the high, full jar on her head—except a woman see some ideal over this work, except she feel the religiousness of life, except she find Christ seated on the well—what a slow death it must be! So for the most part it is, relieved only by some gossip while she waits. If men be working at the well it is a little better. There is some music, the drawing will be accompanied with songs. But these are mere rhythms, without meaning in them, music for the muscles only.

Sometimes in Israel, however, a nobler effort was made—an effort to enlist memory and hope in the work, to realize the essential nobility of labor, to glorify common life with the feelings of sacrifice and brotherhood. Such an effort we find expressed in the text before us. This is one of the most ancient fragments of Scripture, one of the very oldest of human traditions. I love to think of how it has come down to us before God's scribes put it upon paper—not locked away in some old cupboard like manuscript repositories of tradition, useless for centuries and most of them belated when pulled to the light again; not like those papyri which to our day are telling so much about the days of old, documents that have lain in coffins and come down to us side by side with mummies. This Scripture has descended through the generations in the sunshine and the open air, on the lips of living men and women, as fresh and perennial as the gushing spring to which it leaps in antiphon.

> Spring up, O well!
> Sing ye back to her!
> Well which princes digged,
> Nobles of the people delved her
> With their scepters and with their staves.

It is a working man's tradition, a bit of God's Word passed down the centuries by the living lips of labor. The laborers who, drawing water daily, daily also sang the song in accompaniment of their labors, were by it daily reminded that this particular well of theirs had been opened and begun by great men, that this work, which now spelt routine, was, in its origin, invention, zeal, high-born character, self-sacrifice and loving brotherhood. "Princes had dug this well—yea, the nobles of the people had hollowed it out with their scepters and their staves." To recall this took away from these workers the sense of servitude—took away from their work the feeling of heaviness. Duties that had such memories would never become cheap. The baptism this work had felt in the beginning, the brotherliness and self-sacrifice that had blessed its birth were with it still. These very ropes that made their hands so brawny trailed behind them clouds of glory. So that spurt of water in the dark hollow was not the only wellspring. Men's hearts gushed back to it; deep called to deep; fountain to fountain cried out: "Spring up, O well! sing ye back to her." God's gift was answered by leaps of love and joy in hearts that had otherwise worn stale and hopeless by the drudgery of their toil. Brethren, to every honest man and woman

The larger part of life must consist of a laborious routine.

All of us who are worthy have to work with small details, and, as it were, like those water drawers of the East, hand over hand every day upon the same old rope. And the tendency of most of us, even when ours is the ministry of the Word and the sanctuary, is to feel our life dreary and our work cheap. We leave romance to the soldier, wonder to the scientist and to the statesman the sense of the honor of standing in a great succession. We look upon our work as only a privative and exhausting function in our lives. We seek our inspiration in getting away from it and putting ourselves, through literature and art, into those lives which we imagine to be more blessed than ours with richness of feeling and grandeur of vision. What fools we are! We need no escape from work. We need not fawn on others. We also stand in a great succession; we all have a spiritual ancestry. In every piece of drudgery you engage in, so be it honest and helpful to the progress of society, the same inspiring memories are at your disposal as were at theirs who sang of the time when "princes dug their well and nobles hollowed it out with their scepters and with their staves."

There is not a bit of routine, however cheap your unthinking mind may count it, but it was started by genius.

The fundamental facilities of life, the things we use as carelessly as we tread the pavement—the very fire we light, the very alphabet we use, our daily bread, the coins we handle, the wheels that carry us along, the doors we turn on their hinges, the glass through which we see heaven, the tools we handle at our work and food—each represents some early triumph of man's spirit, even greater than those inventions and discoveries which we count the crowning glories of our crowning century. This language we throw so cheaply at each other—Chaucer's, Shakespeare's, Milton's were the mouths that forged it. We cannot use a word—I venture to say we cannot use a meaning, or the variation of a meaning of a word—without molding our mind and lips to the emphasis and accent of some original spirit. The inspiration of genius is on everything we touch. There is not a crank the miller turns, not an engine or a brake upon our railways, not a boat that sails our seas but required genius, character, self-sacrifice for its invention and for its inauguration in the service of humanity. In manual toil, in commerce, in education and in public service, at home, at the council board, in the church, there is not a bit of routine you can put your hand to but the saints and the heroes were at the beginning of it. "Princes dug this well, yea, the nobles of the people hollowed it out with their scepters and with their staves." If I repeat these commonplaces, friends, it is only that we may feel how this life of ours, in the very fiber and grain of it, is saturated and dyed with this purple wonder, this stain of the love and the blood of the hearts of the greatest of men.

In our day there are many who say that knowledge, like the brazen Eastern sun, the higher it rises on the peoples the more it bleaches life, taking the twilight out of the air and the color and wonder out of things around us. This is not true.

Knowledge can never take the wonder out of God's world, nor faith in God himself. It is he who refuses to be taught that loses from life its charm and sacredness. Cease to learn and you will in time starve your powers of admiration, of reverence, of obedience, and all the rest of those delicate faculties which in their union are worship and the very strength of spiritual faith. Intellectual activity in any great degree is not indispensable to a saving knowledge of the truth, but if spiritual life is to become rich and luminous and confident, intellectual activity is absolutely necessary. Christians who ask, why trouble us with this problem, why raise that question, why spend your time in these lines of research, forget, if they ever knew, that the ages of the church in which faith was simplest and sanest were just those ages in which the church most honestly faced the problems of life and the universe. The man who tries to leave intellect out of his spiritual life is the man whose thoughts, however orthodox, about himself, his work, his destiny and his God must inevitably grow thin and cheap. But knowledge can do for you, among all her services, none more religious than this, to take you back to the inspired origin of all common things you handle or administer. Knowledge teaches us that nothing is common or unclean. It reminds us whom we have succeeded, from what great and bleeding hands our various charges in life have been delivered to us, by what a cloud of witnesses we are surrounded. It brings us into the fellowship and communion of the saints. Nay, it leads us deeper, for whatsoever common path of life we be treading, it brings us to the fount and origin of all in the inspiration of man's spirit by the Spirit of God, that descent of the Holy Ghost, the heavenly wisdom which precedes all invention and is the secret of all genius and heroism. But the Light which lighteneth every man that cometh into the world himself took flesh and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. Among the million memories of men we have one supreme, unique. We trace the sacredness and the glory of our life not to this or that great man whom God raised up in our midst and inspired to think and to work, but above and beyond all we trace it to the incarnation of God himself in our life.

In the person of Jesus Christ, God himself did dig these everlasting wells of ours; these liberties, all these offices and inspirations of life, were opened and fulfilled by Jesus Christ. That we come after him and continue that which he began—this is our glory and our power. The life which other men have illustrated and ennobled in fragments Jesus Christ has glorified the whole of it. The whole of it was suffered and achieved by him with perfect purity. He fulfilled all our relations, felt all our passions, had a conscience of all our duties. The incarnation was not taking flesh merely, as many a theology has limited itself to teaching. The incarnation of the gospels was the birth into a home, the looking up from a mother's lap into a mother's face. It was childhood growing with brothers and sisters around it, it was youth taking friends to itself, it was manhood breaking with these friends into the larger fellowship of the nation. It was childhood, it was friendship, it was patriotism—it was also labor. The Carpenter of Nazareth finished his planks and filled his hours of work day by day. And when he stepped forth as teacher into the public life of his people see how his parables reveal him in touch with every common office in the life about him. Servants and masters, judges and clients, kings and their lieutenants, the fisherman, the shepherd, the husbandman, the merchantman, the delver finding treasure, the commercial traveler on his rounds (for the Good Samaritan was a commercial traveler), the unemployed in the marketplace, the beggar at the gate, the publican standing afar off—see how he lived all these lives of common men, glorifying them and speaking from their heart to our heart. The parables are the measure of the breadth of the incarnation.

The depths he carried on himself. He who sought to know men, not only as their Maker and their omniscient Judge, was tempted on all points as we are. Himself bore all our griefs and carried all our sorrows. Pain and weariness, shame and forsakenness, disappointment in those he had loved and trained, the opposition of the rulers, the fickleness of the crowd—he knew them all. And he became subject unto death. When we remember this we begin to understand how sacramental every hour of life may be. Of that very special ordinance of our Lord's institution, wherein is shown forth and applied to believers the saving grace of his death for their sins, of this he said, "Do this in remembrance of me"; and except a man's faith begin here—with the cross of the Lord, with the broken body and shed blood, as God's own sacrifice for sin—it is impossible to understand how he can have penitence enough, or freedom enough, or love enough to enjoy and fulfill the life to which this death was the redemption. But if he has remembered Christ here, there is in truth, by the reality of the incarnation, no part of common life which may not equally be a remembrance and memorial of his glory. "I will make," he said, "the place of my feet glorious"; but there is no place today which is the place of our feet in the paths of duty and suffering but it has been the place of his feet as well, and all the air about it is full of his patience and his victory. Live dutifully, obediently, resolutely, and you shall do all you have to do in remembrance of him; you shall make life one whole sacrament, and, if your faith and understanding be really awake, this hourly sacrament of his life shall be like the sacrament of his death—no memorial only, but communion too. You shall be like her who found him seated upon the well that was her routine and daily drudgery. He will not take the routine and the drudgery away. He gave no answer to her first prayer, "Sir, give me of this water, that I thirst not neither come hither to draw." But he gave her that which she carried with her in her own heart every time she came back with her jar. Every time she came back she would find himself there, till her daily work would grow a daily sacrament and communion with him. So it may be with every one of us, but on one condition, that we be found of him as she was found. "Sir, thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep"; and he had asked her to draw and give him to drink. But she soon discovered that he had fathomed the deeper well of her own heart. "Come and see a man which told me all that ever I did." She soon discovered that he could cleanse this deep pit of its bitterness and make to spring up within it the water of life. In this command of the spiritual life of man Jesus Christ is absolutely unique. That his power over it reaches the degree of new creative force proves him divine. O! it is well for us to summon up the multitude of our forerunners, our big brothers of the crowd, not only that we may give the praise and glory to him who is the light that lighteneth all, but that we may acknowledge the end of their help just where his great help begins. Helpful they are as fellow-worshipers, with their example, their infection of faith, of energy, of patience, but he alone hath entered within the veil. Helpful they are in the outer sunshine and storm of life, helpful in their testimony that God was with them, our brothers, in the very work in which we have succeeded them. But behind the veil, where every man is alone with his sin and his God, Christ only can help. O, brethren, in the loneliness of sin, on the battleground of temptation, we know how very far away the crowd feels; how utterly irrelevant our brothers' merit; how helpless our brothers' love. It is just here Christ penetrates and proves himself divine. Of our guilt he tells us, I have borne it, and stand by thee; of our sin, This is my charge; of our weakness, My grace is sufficient for thee; of our shame, I love thee, the Father hath forgiven thee; of our hopelessness, I will trust thee with my work, with my interests. Be of good cheer.

Other forces have helped men to penitence, but it is a historical fact that nowhere have men found penitence so real and so lasting as at the foot of the cross of the Lord Jesus Christ. Other men have proclaimed, consciously or unconsciously, the need of a new birth. He alone has been able to renew a right spirit within man, he alone to create a clean heart. At the present day we are able to see what life and providence mean when you withdraw from them the three things which form the essence of Christ's religion—penitence, the forgiveness of sins and regeneration. Some of our leading writers of fiction have been giving us their interpretation of reconstruction of human life, minus the ideals and beliefs which the gospel of Jesus Christ brings to bear upon them. Over and over again you say to yourself as some character falls and does not rise again, as some prodigal is turned away from the door, and some are confirmed in bitterness, and some pushed further in sin, and Providence is arraigned and condemned for all these consequences of life with the gospel left out of it: O, if some belief in Christ and his message were to break across all this, some notions of penitence. They have done at least this service for us—these Christless painters of human life—they have shown us that without Christ and his power human life is hopeless and divine Providence a ghastly cruelty. But if out of this generation, by any possibility, there was wholly to die the faith of Christ's power to renew the heart and open the wells of life, it could never be forgotten that along all these common roads of our life, our work, our duty men did find the wells dug for them by the greatest, purest, sanest life that ever lived, and that to His work and love for man, to the fountains he started on human life, they trace all the liberties, the relations, the forces they enjoy today. Brethren, therefore, our common life is everywhere glorious. The air swarms with hope. There is no spot we can tread, no work we do, but was the field or trophy of some heroism, some victory of a brother spirit. But above all we have Christ. God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by Jesus Christ our Lord.

CONFIRMATION ADMISSIBLE.

BY A. HUELSTER, PH. D., EDITOR OF THE KIRCHENBOTE.

I had read in The Congregationalist about a pastor preparing a confirmation class during Lent, and said to myself, "Well, it seems we have English churches that confirm just as well as some of our German churches do." But in The Congregationalist of April 30 I find the question asked, "What is a confirmation class in a Congregational church, and what place has any rite of confirmation in our churches?" The writer considers it an illustration of the ritualistic drift of our time—one feature of the anti-Puritan reaction.

According to authoritative deliverances on the subject, Congregationalism stands principally for the autonomy of the local church; it stands also for fellowship of the churches. Its individuality is, then, of a governmental, and not of a doctrinal, type. Not long ago the case of a noted man was cited, who, on being immersed, found it next to impossible to retain his membership in a presbytery, or to receive from the latter his credentials as a Presbyterian minister in good standing, while he would have found no such difficulty in a Congregational association. Calvinism, mild Calvinism, Arminianism and Lutheranism are all found within the folds of our Congregational churches. No doubt will be entertained as to the first two, but if any one should doubt the assertion as to the last two, I would refer him to the not inconsiderable number of Arminian Methodist ministers who are now pastors of Congregational churches, though their doctrinal beliefs have remained unchanged; and, from personal knowledge, I can state that, at least among our German churches, there are such who were Lutheran and in doctrine still are such. The Congregational demands made upon them when they were received into our church fellowship they could readily and sincerely assent to without rendering impossible the retaining of their doctrinal Lutheranism. Of course, Reformed churches found it, if anything, still easier to enter into our fellowship without changing their doctrinal status.

Now, as a general thing (German) Lutheran and Reformed Churches practice confirmation, and in comparatively many cases, it seems, have retained this practice on becoming Congregational. Are we to understand, then, that on this account they are not truly Congregational, though they come up to all other requirements? If confirmation is decidedly antagonistic to the genius of Congregationalism, should this not have been plainly stated to churches, as above indicated, when they applied for admission to our fellowship? And if the council called to aid in organizing a church or to admit a church, as above, into fellowship took no exception to the rite of confirmation, but passed an affirmative vote with the full knowledge that such rite was practiced, has not in that case such reception the full force of permission, if not of (universal) approval?

But care should be taken, it seems to me, when a new church is founded and organized consisting, it may be, mainly of members who formerly affiliated with churches in which confirmation is practiced and who might wish to continue such practice. All depends for the most part, at least in many cases, on the founder—if he introduces or continues the practice any successor will find it next to impossible to effect a change. That is my case as pastor of my present (German) church. I found the people bent on the specified observance on my arrival, and it would be very unwise to discontinue the usage against their wishes. When I came here confirmation was an entirely new thing to me, i. e., the rite itself was, not the religious or catechetical instruction requisite thereto. Whether the rite is observed or not such instruction ought, nevertheless, to be given children of suitable age. The teaching in Sunday school is not sufficient, nor can preaching or any other impartation of religious knowledge take the place of persistent and faithful catechetical instruction by the pastor. It is a rare opportunity to impress his pupils for good and to lead them to Christ. And if they profess faith in Christ and desire to become members of the church what can he do after they have made a good confession and the church has so voted but receive them.

The rite of confirmation is in itself simple and even beautiful; the great danger is that people think it settles and perfects their Christianity, enabling it to pass muster despite all shortcomings. When, as here, I must perform the rite I try to make it unmistakably clear that there is no merit in it whatever unless those confirmed live up to the solemn vow they make of love to God and faithfulness in Christ's service.

THE CHILDREN'S DAY.

BY BERTHA GERNEAUX DAVIS.

I wonder what they do this Children's Day—
Those little young-faced angels passed away
From mother sight and mother arms. Ah me!
I fain would know what Children's Day can be
In that bright city where they go! Once more
I scan those pages often read before.
I see the little children, loved, caressed,
And nestled with fond touches on his breast.
I think he surely must have loved them much,
Those little children, when he said of such
His Father's kingdom was to be—the while
He answered look with look, and smile with smile.

I know he cannot change, but is today
The same as yesterday. I know the way
Is not less easy now for little feet
Than when adown each Galilean street
They gladly ran to meet him. Ah, I know
He holds them fast today, he loves them so!
And then those little ones to you and me
More near and dear than those of Galilee,
Who took the sunshine with them when they passed
Beyond our sight—he surely holds them fast.

This Children's Day as sweetly on his breast
The little, shy newcomers take their rest
As those who feel his clasp no longer strange,
Since many years ago they made the change
From mother arms to his. Our eyes are dim
The while we listen to the children's hymn,
Each missing some small voice, or tender face,
Whose absence seems to leave an empty space
Among the palms and lilies. Yet we wear
A smile upon our faces, for most fair
We know that Jesus makes this Children's Day
For all the darlings who have passed away.

It would almost seem as if some women had forgotten to be wives in their zeal to show themselves devoted mothers. In an age when children's rights are so strenuously insisted on is there not danger that the "little dears" may monopolize the rights of the "big dears"—the husbands and fathers who are toiling in this world of fierce competition and wearing anxiety? Life was never harder for the average business man than now. He never needed more the steadying, soothing influence of a restful home. But in many cases women are too much absorbed with their children to minister as they ought to the head of the household. Hard-working men need and appreciate sympathy, not of the obtrusive, fussy sort, but the quiet pervasive sort which anticipates small wants, keeps petty worries out of sight and radiates cheer as a flower exhales its perfume.

That was a choice bit of advice which a Christian mother gave her young daughter as she started on her summer vacation: "Look out for the dull folk and try to cheer them up." People who have many interests in life can hardly understand the forms of ennui which oppress those who have few resources within themselves, and seldom come in contact with the busy, bustling outside world. Elderly people, in particular, suffer from a nameless dread of the future which a half-hour's chat with a bright young girl would do much to dissipate. Dreary surroundings, lack of fresh literature, no opportunity to see new faces, small knowledge of what is happening in the world of politics or science are some of the causes which contribute to dullness and discouragement. It requires only a little tact and thoughtfulness to cheer up those who are thus circumstanced, and the ministry, though simple, is most rewarding.

A more striking contrast in the training of little children can hardly be imagined than is afforded between the beautiful suggestions which cluster around Children's Day and those awakened by reading Ouida's study of royalty in the June Forum. Speaking of the youthful king of Spain, now eleven, and the still younger crown prince of Prussia, aged eight, she says that only one thought—that of war—fills their boyish minds. The former climbs on Marshal Campos's knees and begs to be told how Moors were killed in Morocco, Cubans in Cuba, and how many years he will have to wait before he, too, can have the joy of killing them. The pompous little German lieutenant is bewitched with gold lace and buttons and both children are being educated to find their toys in military science, their theater in the battle-field. Thus the appetite for war is cultivated from early infancy, although both profess the religion of the Prince of Peace. The lads of their own age who now run before their carriages, shouting their names with joyous outcry, may be for them, a score of years hence, crippled, maimed, riddled with shot, torn with explosive bullets and drowned by torpedoes. What a significant contrast to the way in which American children are taught the principles of human equality and freedom!

THE SUMMER SUNDAY.

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Here it is once more, the beautiful Sunday of the summer, when the heat lies on the landscape in silver waves of veiling haze, when the air is full of music and the flowers bloom and the harvests ripen, and on every hand nature beckons and life invites. The beautiful summer Sunday, God's Eden gift to the toiling children of men, yet how lightly we prize it, and how readily we trample on its hours of peace and barter its precious privileges! I say "we" advisedly, because if American Christians are aware that there is a decline in its observance they cannot shirk the responsibility for it. At our doors lies the blame if the ignorant, the poor, or the thoughtless, and those who are none of these, but frankly and unfeignedly worldly instead, openly break the Lord's Day.

Whenever an avowedly Christian household in any community shall consistently and constantly keep Sunday, there will be a higher tone to public sentiment in that place. All households will feel it. Whenever and wherever every professing Christian, in any town or village, stands steadfastly for the tranquil observance of the Lord's Day, there will be a rallying to his side of others as ready to follow good leadership as bad. The danger lies in an easy letting down of the bars in our looser social attitudes, in our condoning of matters once regarded as unlawful for the Lord's disciples on his day.

Especially on vacations and when absent from home let us be careful to keep fast by our ordinary home customs. The word said in other days needs often to be repeated. In the inn by the sea, in the mountain resort, at the beautiful country house of a friend, let not Sunday be secularized. "A holy reverence all that day" should befit our moods and manner. If there is an open sanctuary let us seek it, thus upholding the local church and encouraging the pastor. If we can gather in the evening for sacred music, that the day may be rounded out with praise, let us not neglect the opportunity. Our Sunday reading, too, let it be of a sort that provides for spiritual elevation.

The traveler who is likely to meet little children in her summer jaunts may carry with her a few pictures, leaflets and story-books appropriate to Sunday and find many a quiet opportunity of thus sowing good seed. Not all children of the well-to-do are taught about God, and one finds little folk in purple and fine linen as ignorant of him who came to save as the children of the slums. A summer Sunday may afford an open door to minister sweetly and unobtrusively to some of these, and the blessed results may be known in after days. And if they are never known here what matters it, since God knows.

If we are to keep intact the day of which our fathers thought so highly that they rested on it, even when first arrived on our shores, the day which is our dearest heritage, we must be aware of danger to it and alert to protect our precious American Sunday. American? Yes. Jewish? Yes. Christian? Yes. Old as the world? Yes. Dear as the heart of the infinite Father and full of heavenly sweetness? Yes and forever, yes.

HOW ABOUT AMUSEMENTS?

BY REV. JOHN DE PEU.

Among the practical problems that perplex young Christians—and some older Christians as well—there is none more persistent than the one suggested by the question, How about amusements? What amusements may a Christian conscientiously engage in? Is there any touchstone by which we may distinguish the true and reject the base metal? In this, as in all of life, guidance is to be sought through a discovery of principles rather than by multiplying precepts. And each disciple must make for himself the application of those principles to his own conduct, recognizing that his own conscience and experience are safer guides than others' criticisms or cajoleries.

A guard may be set against excess, and equally against defect. For we find prevalent two extreme theories of life, neither of which is wholly wise. One theory is exemplified by those who live for sensuous enjoyment, making mere pleasuring the chief end of life, which both sober reason and the Christian spirit condemn. As man was designed to be more than a monkey, he ought not to be satisfied with a mere monkey life of eating and drinking and playing pranks. The other extreme is exemplified in that severe, and now rare, asceticism which estimates things as evil in proportion to the pleasure they afford, and makes life only a prolonged suicide. But it is enough for us to know that "the Son of Man came eating and drinking"; that he appreciated and shared social amenities; and that he appointed the disciples' place, where his own had been, in the world though not of the world. It is plain, then, that somewhere in the middle ground between these two extremes the sphere of the ideal life is to be found—not in the unlimited indulgence of every appetite, not in ascetic separation from all that is naturally enjoyable.

Every one needs more or less diversion and entertainment. The Master recognized such a need in his disciples when they returned from their exciting and exhausting missionary tour, and he invited them to camp out in a retired spot that they might rest a while. Neither work nor play is to be esteemed as an end sufficient in itself. Each is to be regarded as a means toward the perfect development of the human soul in the full completeness of all its powers and capacities. Practical experience shows that no one can attain, or retain, his highest efficiency in body, mind and spirit through uninterrupted and unrelieved toil. After prolonged application to one task we gain power through diversion. After prolonged mental strain we gain new energy through being for a time entertained without mental effort. After protracted confinement to the lessons that sorrow teaches we may need to be brought nearer to our fellows, and may gain power to use our new-found wisdom through being taught to laugh once more.

Play is often the best, and sometimes the only needed, physic. An old legend represents the apostle John as finding diversion and entertainment in the care of a tame partridge, whereby he learned more highly to revere both the Creator and his every creature. Luther wrote better and preached better because of the hours over his flute. That prince among modern prophets, Charles Kingsley, who was as enthusiastic in his fishing as in his philanthropy, gave harassed and heartsick Christians a hint worth heeding in his criticism of Frank Headley, the young curate in Two Years Ago, a man who worked hard enough but who never had learned to play wholeheartedly. In the long run the hardest player will make the hardest worker. We work best by not working always. The bow that is never unbent loses in time its elasticity. Spirits to keep their strength must sometimes be relieved of their tension.

There is one word that will keep us at the right point of view in discussing and judging the utility of any amusement or sport or method of entertainment — recreation. This word will serve as the touchstone we have been seeking. It will distinguish the gold from the base metal. Apply this test to all the amusements that come under discussion. Are they true "recreations"? Are you in body, mind and spirit stronger, fresher, better for them? The amusements that "re-create" are healthful and desirable, are to be approved and cultivated. But if, on the other hand, any particular amusement, however pleasing it may be, is not "re-creating," if it exhausts vital power instead of restoring it, if it leaves you with less energy of body, mind and spirit, less ready for concentrated and continuous work, with less capacity for inspiration and less courage for self-denial, if, in short, it makes you less of a man, less of a woman, that sufficiently condenms it so far as your conduct is concerned. Thus the general question must be made particular in each instance, and may be answered by being resolved into the intermediate question—Is the amusement a true means of "recreation"?

A LYRIC OF JOY.

Over the shoulders and slopes of the dune
I saw the white daisies go down to the sea,
A host in the sunshine, a snowdrift in June,
The people God sends us to set our hearts free.

The bobolinks rallied them up from the dell,
The orioles whistled them out of the wood,
And all of their singing was, "Earth, it is well!"
And all of their dancing was, "Life, thou art good!"

QUEEN LOUISE OF PRUSSIA.

BY JANET SANDERSON.

In the Museum of Paintings in Köln, as the Germans say, and Cologne, as the Americans call it, there hangs a life-size picture of Louise, the beautiful queen of Prussia, painted by Gustave Carl Ludwig Richter in 1879. She is represented as coming down the steps of the palace, clad in a simple white woolen gown with heavy embroidery around the bottom of the skirt, which rests upon the steps at her back. The neck is low, the sleeves are short, and the waist is tied by a pale pink ribbon. A dark blue velvet mantle bordered with ermine hangs from her right shoulder and is folded over her right arm, which rests upon her breast, while her left hand keeps the robe from falling. A white scarf is bound loosely about her head and neck and a star shines above her forehead. Her bright blue eyes look out from a fair, lovely face.

There are many paintings of this much loved woman, but this is considered the most beautiful of all. It is said that Richter was asked to paint a spiritual and patriotic picture for the museum at Cologne and chose for his subject Prussia's queen, Louise. He studied the many portraits of the queen made during her life and selected the features of the one which Kaiser William considered to represent most satisfactorily his dear mother. It is also related that at an evening reception the kaiser, on seeing a certain beautiful woman descending a staircase, exclaimed: "How like my mother she is!" and that this suggested to Richter the painting of the queen coming down the palace steps, for which the same lady served as a model.

Louise was a Mecklenburg princess who married Prince Frederick William, afterwards Frederick William III., king of Prussia. She was the mother of two kings, Frederick William IV. and William I. who became emperor of Germany and was known as Kaiser William I., the grandmother of Emperor Frederick III., and the great-grandmother of the present Emperor William II. She was born at Hanover, in 1776, and as her mother died when she was very young she went to live with her grandmother at Darmstadt. She was a sweet child, having those unselfish traits which made her so much loved by all who knew her. Her youth was spent much like that of other girls, the time being occupied with her studies, of which history was her favorite, with her music and sewing. We read in one account of Louise being taught to embroider stockings for herself and sisters. She was married to Prince Frederick William when she was seventeen years old, and her sister, Frederika, wedded Prince Louis, the brother of Frederick William, at the same time. When the procession entered Berlin, these two beautiful princesses in the great golden chariot of state were greeted under a triumphal arch by eighty children dressed in white and wearing wreaths and garlands of flowers. A double wedding was celebrated in the old palace at Berlin.

Louise loved children and had many parties for them. At one of her birthday fêtes the children played the game of chrysalis and butterfly, just as the little ones of today play in the kindergarten. There were as many children as Louise was years old wrapped in gray coverings on the floor, from which they crawled out and, spreading the most beautiful, gauzy wings, flew and fluttered and whirled about the palace hall to the tones of sweet music. One day when she had become queen, as she was walking in the garden, some boys were playing rudely, chasing each other as boys will, when one of them tumbled against the queen. He was greatly frightened at this breach of manners, but all his fears vanished as she caught the little fellow up in her arms and kissed him, saying: "Boys will be boys."

Louise was a devoted mother and spent many happy hours in the nursery, playing at horse and soldiers with her boys, telling them stories and singing lullabies as she rocked them into dreamland. There was a nest full of little ones—Frederick William, who would one day be king, William and Charlotte, little Ferdinand, whose death while he was a baby brought such grief to the queen, Charles and Alexandrine, then the little Louise and last the baby Albert. A pretty story is told of how a poorly clad little girl went one day to the queen, who was playing with her children in a garden, and, not knowing whom she approached, asked the beautiful woman to buy some cornflowers. The queen, full of sympathy, spoke kindly to the child and learned from her that she had a sick mother at home who could earn nothing. The queen bought all her flowers, rewarding her generously, then showed the little Charlotte, who afterward became the empress of Russia, and the little William, who became emperor of Germany, how they could make wreaths without scissors, pointing out the simple beauty of the flowers as she put the wreath on Charlotte's head. The children never forgot this lesson and when, a few years later, their mother died, the cornflower, which is like our bachelor's button, became their favorite blossom.

The wars of Napoleon brought trouble to Germany and sadness to the queen. She was sent a long way off from her Berlin home with her children, but tried to keep happy for their sake, until a severe illness came to her and she lay ill for many weeks, yet her faith in God never wavered. In a letter to her father she says, "Better times will surely come; our faith in him who is all goodness assures me of this," and then she tells him of her home life and the children, who are her greatest comfort. News came to her from the battle-field of the victories gained by the French over her husband, the king, and she sometimes went herself to the field of war, riding about on horseback speaking words of comfort to the German soldiers, who rallied around her, promising to fight for and save their beloved land for the sake of so beautiful, so brave, so heroic a queen.

When the war was over and Louise went back to Berlin in a splendid coach with lilac colored linings, which had been sent as a gift, she was accompanied by a long procession, and cheers and music welcomed her everywhere. But sickness again prostrated her, and for many weeks she lay patiently suffering; yet with the return of spring came renewed strength, and soon after her thirty-fourth birthday she made a long talked of visit to her father and the grandmother with whom she had spent her childhood. But the journey was too exhausting. Weaker and weaker grew the lovely queen, until in the bright sunshine of one summer morning, with her hands clasped in those of her husband, her two darling boys, Frederick William and William, standing by her side, she turned her head gently and said, "I am dying, O Jesus, make it easy."

All Germany mourned the death of this noble woman and queen, who will forever live in the hearts of her people. She lies buried in a quiet corner of the garden at Charlottenburg, one of her favorite spots, her resting place marked by a marble figure of herself reclining peacefully on a couch as in sleep.

THE ART OF FINDING HAPPINESS.

In a helpful talk on this subject in the English magazine called The Young Woman Rev. James Thew develops the thought that the major part of our appointed happiness in this world is simply missed through carelessness or want of thought. He says:

Consider for a moment what comparative trifles will give pleasure—sometimes almost rapture—to certain minds. A bit of commonplace natural scenery, a fearless expression of honest opinion, a small deed of kindness, the merriment of a little child, the rosy light of a humble English home—these things can impart a joy of no mean order to a heart that is capable of receiving it. And when we remember that life is made up of such and similar things, we see what that man or woman misses who has not been, in some sort, schooled to perceive them. It is truly pitiful to think how much the great majority of people miss in this way. It is not that they are deliberately morose. It is not that they affect a contemptuous indifference. They simply do not understand the charm of common things.

The main difference, I believe, between two human beings, in the matter I am speaking of, lies in this: the one finds his happiness where alone it is to be found, if ever it be found, at his feet; while the other seeks it anywhere but there. At his feet—in the common arrangements of life, in the everyday relationships of life, in the patches of sunlight that lie even on the dreariest and most monotonous paths of life, and not in the romantic, the extreme, the superlative. You shall take the wealthiest man you know, and, supposing him to be possessed of a truly rational soul, you will find that the extent to which he is happy is the extent to which he is capable of seeing into and enjoying common things—the affections of home, the humanities, the charities, the love of friends, the companionship of good books, the worship of the house of God and the numberless deeds of daily, patient, though unrecorded, heroism, of which only those who are "willingly ignorant" are, or need be, ignorant at all. The question for all who desire to add to their legitimate happiness is this, Can we pick it up on our appointed journey, or is our appointed journey converted into a laborious attempt to produce it elsewhere? The one is the method by which, with a quick eye and a warm heart, the desert can be made to blossom like the rose. The other would change the very garden of the Lord into a dry and thirsty land.

WATER FOR SUMMER TOURISTS.

More illness is caused by impure drinking water than is generally attributed to this cause, and the great army of summer travelers and bicycle riders will do well to heed this advice of Mrs. Ellen H. Richards in an article published in The American Kitchen Magazine:

In general it may be said that a public water supply drawn from a pond or reservoir is less liable to be unsafe than are country wells, in spite of the fact that the water may be warm, of a brown color and even have a distinct taste. Such water has been stored and exposed to sun and air for a time sufficient to allow of the dying out of most disease germs, if any had found their way into its sources. Also the water sheds of such town supplies are usually thinly settled so that the danger is at a minimum. In the case of running water the conditions are quite different. It has been a practice too long allowed, although not unrebuked, to use a stream for the joint purpose of a sewer and of a water supply, and consequently unfiltered water from any stream is to be looked upon with suspicion, until proved to be innocent. . . .

It seems like an act of vandalism to say anything which shall destroy a man's faith in "the well at grandfather's" or "at Uncle John's," with its unfailing supply of clear cold water, so refreshing, but in grandfather's time one or two gallons a day furnished a sufficient quantity for the needs of each individual, and even if this amount, after being used was poured on the ground in the immediate neighborhood of the well to percolate slowly through the soil and thus serve to keep up the supply, the capacity of the soil was in no way overtaxed, and the water thus used over and over again was well purified each time and was not, as a rule, dangerous. But now that the old homestead is occupied for several months in the year by those who have become accustomed to the generous allowance of American cities, twenty, fifty or even 100 gallons a day for each person, the old well has greater demands made upon it, the surrounding ground ceases to be an efficient filter and the water, still cold and colorless, may become, before any one notices taste or odor, so contaminated as to carry disease, if not death, to the thirsty traveler who, heated and tired, takes a deep draught from the tin dipper hanging so invitingly on the pump, and who will never know where he "caught" typhoid fever. The summer boarders, too, may have returned to the city home before disease developed in any of them.

Is there, then, no longer safety in drinking water? Indeed there is, but only from a known source. The majority of large towns are supplied with safe water, but it needs the eye of the trained observer to find it along country roads and in small summer resorts, and the best advice which can be given to the summer traveler who regards health as of first consequence is, not to drink unboiled water or milk in any doubtful circumstances; better go thirsty half a day than to lose three months' time by an attack of fever.

The deepest prayer a human being can breathe was uttered by the Psalmist centuries ago: "O, knit my heart unto thee!"

Dear children, ye ought not to cease from hearing or declaring the word of God because you do not always live according to it, nor keep it in mind. For inasmuch as you love it and crave after it, it will assuredly be given unto you. But when ye hear the word of God surrender yourselves wholly to it as if for eternity with a full purpose of will to retain it in your mind and to order your life according to it; and let it sink down right deep into your heart as into an eternity. If afterward it should come to pass that you should let it slip and never think of it again, yet the love and aspiration which once really existed live forever before God and in him ye shall find the fruit thereof; that is to all eternity it shall be better for you than if you had never felt them.—John Tauler.

The more you do God's work within yourselves, the more he will give you the opportunity of doing external work for him.—Neale.

The confidence of a power always at work within us, manifesting itself in our powerlessness, a love filling up our lovelessness, a wisdom surmounting our folly, the knowledge of our own right to glory in this love, power and wisdom, the certainty that we can do all righteous acts by submitting to this righteous Being and that we do them best when we walk in a line chosen for us, not of our own choosing—this is strength surely and nothing else, which carries through earth and lifts us into heaven.—F. D. Maurice.

O dull of heart inclosed doth lie,
In each "Come, Lord," a "Here am I."
Thy love, thy longing are not thine,
Reflections of a love divine:
Thy very prayer to thee was given,
Itself a messenger from heaven.
—R. C. Trench.

O Lord, who hast given us these treasures of earth's strength and opportunity in earthen vessels that we might learn the need of trust in thee, help us so to use and cherish our frail bodies that they may be most effective for the work which thou hast given us to do. Pardon our transgressions and shortcomings. Make us strong to labor, patient for endurance, filled—as becometh temples of thy Spirit—with all purity, girded and ready for all service. Help us to keep the nightly and weekly rest which thou hast appointed with willing and obedient hearts. May sleep refresh us, food nourish us and pleasure bring us no regret. Preserve us from the shame and folly of idleness and from the temptation to presumptuous overwork for merely earthly gains; but when the hour of need appears, and for thy love or for the service of thy children we are called to work beyond our strength, restore us, if it please thee, or accept our sacrifice for the sake of Christ, who denied not his body for our need. And when these earthen vessels of our sense and strength are broken, receive our spirits for the sake of Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE FIRST SEVEN YEARS.

A distinguished educator has said, "Give me the first seven years of a child's life and you may have all the rest." The value of these early years is forcibly illustrated in the biography of one of the greatest philanthropists of modern times, the Earl of Shaftesbury. His childhood was singularly lonely and neglected. His parents cared nothing for his society, and, untroubled by any ideas of parental duty, they gave him over entirely to the care of the servants.

Fortunately for the sensitive child and for the world, the nurse to whose care he was specially intrusted for the first seven years of his life was a kind-hearted woman and a devout Christian. She soon won the heart of the susceptible child, and planted therein the seed which afterward brought forth such abundant fruit. She taught him to believe in a loving God and developed a desire to serve him by being helpful to his fellow-creatures. She taught him a prayer which the great earl never forgot to repeat daily throughout his long and busy life. He was wont to say that this prayer had been of more value to him than all the religious teachings of later years. When this good woman died she left him her watch, and to his dying day the earl would wear no other, saying, "It was left to me by the best friend I ever had." At seven years of age he was sent away to a boys' school, which he describes as one of the worst in England. Here he learned little and suffered brutal treatment. Shrinking from the society of the rough boys, he lived on the memory and love of his one true friend, and thus her teaching sank deeper into his life.

The work which this nobleman accomplished for the neglected and helpless classes, especially for the cruelly abused factory children, is known throughout the world. He gave up ease, political advancement and popularity, and accepted in their place unceasing labor, neglect and even persecution that he might become the champion of the working people in Parliament. That he might know for himself their condition he spent his leisure hours in the factories and mines, in the homes of the poor and the haunts of the outcast, and was known among them as "our earl."

When near the close of his life the earl said to a friend, with a touching tenderness of tone, "I simply cannot bear to leave this world with so much misery in it." His wonderful example is especially encouraging to those who, even in the humblest ways, are ministering to childhood. Let the teachings of the first seven years of a child's life be as truly spiritual as were those of Lord Shaftesbury, and all the influences of after years cannot easily turn the mind from the early ideal.

GUIDING THE CONVERSATION OF CHILDREN.

Much has been written in reference to directing the reading of children. Of equal importance is the direction of their conversation. Many opportunities for securing this end are wasted in the average household. Possibly the mealtime is as favorable an occasion as any, for the family is then all together. The boys and girls rush home from school and are apt to eat their dinners in the same hurried way. It is needless to speak of the physical injury resulting from such habits. If some interesting topic of conversation were introduced in which the children could join, at least by asking questions, two results would be secured—a quiet, orderly dinner and a fund of information which would educate as much as the instruction at school.

Mothers often long to accomplish this, but fail because no special plan is formed. One feasible method which has been tested is along the line of biography. The lives of noted people told in story form never fail to interest children. Real life, a "true story" always attracts. Anecdotes about Washington, Lincoln and other famous characters in our nation's history could be narrated. Nothing can be more fascinating than the life of Marcus Whitman—his indomitable perseverance and courage, his martyrdom and the college founded as his monument. Such a narrative cannot be related without furnishing much information regarding the early history of our country. The lives of eminent authors and poets, artists and sculptors, kings and queens, also furnish an inexhaustible fund from which to draw. Many of these things are touched upon even in primary schools, and great will be the delight of the children to be able to share in the conversation by telling what they already know. Important cities and other places of interest may be talked about in the same way. The conversation on Sunday may be directed along the line of religious biography or the story of the Sunday school lesson.

Lack of time for preparation cannot be made an excuse. Who does not have at least ten minutes a day that is often wasted, in which a book might be taken up and the necessary information secured? Children brought up in homes where care is taken to furnish the mind with food as well as the body become intelligent and refined and good conversers. In future years they will look back with delight to the hours spent with father and mother at the social meal.

MRS. DWIGHT M PRATT.

GAIN CONFIDENCE EARLY.

If mothers would secure their children's confidence when they are little they would have a hold upon their boys and girls which would be of great satisfaction as they grow to years of manhood and womanhood. A mother who has thus gained the confidence of her children is able, now that they have come to the inquiring age, to answer many serious questions for them, the agreement having been made while they were quite young that they should always come to her with puzzling questions about the use or development of their bodies, rather than seek knowledge from their companions. Everything is treated sacredly, and although it was not an easy thing to answer questions from her boy of eleven about his origin, yet it was truthfully done, and she felt repaid when he put his arms around her neck and with tears in his eyes said, "Why, mamma, it seems as if I loved you better now." These children have kept their promise and their mother is their only confidante in these sacred matters.

This is a suggestion for young mothers, for it is not easy to commence with children who have begun to think for themselves. The time is when they are little and you have all their sweet confidence. Much of the sorrow and distress of family life would be avoided if mothers pursued this course. A. L. H.

A NIGHT IN JUNE.

BY GRACE T. SPEAR.

The golden censers of the skies
Are swinging, pale and low,
While, close at hand, the fireflies
Their flickering torches show.

The incense laden summer breeze
That sways the flowers nigh
Croons o'er the nestlings in the trees
A drowsy lullaby.

And myriad flute-like voices tell
The hour of rest is here.
The katydids the chorus swell,
The frogs are piping clear.

In reverence I bow my head
And softly breathe a prayer
To him whose wondrous love has made
The world so sweet and fair:

"O, may no sinful thought or word
This heavenly music jar,
This symphony of breeze and bird,
Of insect, flower and star.

"But, through thine influence, graciously
My spirit so attune
That I shall be at one with thee,
As is this night of June."

The advantage of study, I expect, is not in the number of things we learn by it, but simply that it teaches us the one thing worth knowing—not what, but how to think. Nobody can learn that from other people.—James Russell Lowell.

Sift with one quart of flour two teaspoonfuls Cleveland's Baking Powder and one-half teaspoon salt. Rub in shortening (one-half cup butter and one tablespoon lard) and wet with enough sweet milk or water to make a soft dough. Handle as little as possible and roll out about one inch thick. Cut the desired size with biscuit cutter and bake twenty minutes in a quick oven. Break in half and butter.

Have ready a quart of berries, crushed and sweetened with one small cup of granulated sugar. Place lower half of biscuit, buttered side up, on plate on which it is to be served; cover with crushed berries, then on top the upper half, buttered side up, cover again with crushed berries, and serve at once with or without cream or strawberry sauce.

The Conversation Corner.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS: You know what this picture means—that at last we have heard from our Arctic boy, Pomiuk! The letter came from Dr. Grenfell, who is on a hurried trip to England, while waiting for the ice-blockade to break and let him sail away to the north-land.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, OXFORD, ENG.

Dear Mr. Martin: I write just one line from the classic walls of my old college to send you good news. I heard from Dr. Robinson, my co-worker in Labrador, yesterday. All well; went to the North, Hopedale, on Jan. 9. Pomiuk was alive, although not well yet. Dr. R. thinks he is a little stronger. He has been baptized under the name of Gabriel. He is very bright, very cheerful and very happy.

Much blessing has attended Dr. R.'s labors, especially in the conversion of a well-known man, who writes me, "I never knew what happiness was before." What a Master we serve! I sail May 30 for St. John's and my time is brief, but I am so deeply rejoicing over this first news that I had to pass it on. O how keenly I long for the first view again of the rock-bound Labrador!

WILFRED GRENFELL.

P. S. Please don't forget I'm an honorary Cornerer! I often look into the now valued Corner Scrap-Book. We are going to adopt a similar one for our Young Trawlers' Union. You will hear more of that anon. In answer to your question about dogs [see Corner Scrap-Book, April 30], No, our dogs seldom or never bark. They sing often all night! They also bite. Dr. Watts should have written, "Let dogs delight to howl and bite," if he meant "Huskie" dogs!

Next to hearing that Pomiuk, who was left so low last summer, after his long and terrible experience, is still alive, we are rejoiced to know that he is counted by the Moravians a disciple of Jesus and has been received into their church. What a showing this is of "the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man," that the poor little heathen boy, left to perish on the ground in desolate Labrador, with no one to care either for his body or soul, has been in the good providence of our God raised up to life, has learned of Christ and his salvation, and received a new name, even the name of the angel of God! Let us thank him for this and pray still for our far-away friend, that he may be kept by the power of God worthy of his new faith and his new name.

The next letter in my pile is not from frozen Labrador, but from sunny Italy:

FLORENCE.

Dear Mr. Martin: . . . The warm Italian sunshine streams in at the window and the voices of little children float up from the street below. I am reminded of the Corner whenever special bits of childlife confront me. I have come to the conclusion that children are children the world over. Here, as well as in America, I notice that they play leap-frog, that they come merrily out of school when the noonhour strikes, and that they put up jokes on one another and on the passing traveler. In Rome I was interested in noticing the circles and lines on the pavement in the Roman Forum, showing the games the old Romans used to play, resembling, it is said, the modern game of chess. I cannot now tell you of sundry adventures I have had with cats, but I must mention a little cunning, three-year old girl I met in Rome, who could speak English, French and Italian equally well. Her mother is English, her father is Italian and her grandmother French.

One allusion in the above letter recalls a question recently asked by a Corner boy:

What was the "Roman Forum" mentioned in last week's Congregationalist?

Perhaps if the first correspondent is still in Italy he will explain it. No, I see by reference to the Corner of May 7 that it is the "Roman Forum in London" that was spoken of by Katharine. So we must leave it to Katharine herself, or—a bright thought strikes me—to the Home Editor, who sailed on her pilgrimage to England a week ago today, thus assuring a letter from her!

These different travelers across the ocean remind me that I have had, since I wrote the last Corner, an ocean trip myself, which I ought to tell you of. I took ship in Boston and landed a half hour later—in Winthrop! You read the letter two weeks ago from a new Cornerer there? Well, it was a mere accident that it happened to be printed that day, when an "ecclesiastical council" met in that seaside town to start the new church I spoke of. It was my day in Boston, and seeing others on their way there I went too. The course along the North Shore was, I suppose, the same over which Governor Winthrop and the Bradstreets, spoken of last week, came from Salem to found Boston. Yes, for we passed "Governor's," with Fort Winthrop on it!

The ocean voyage over, we were met on the shore, not by wild Indians with feathers in their hair, but by a company of bright boys with "G. U." inscribed on their caps. I supposed that meant that we were to go up with them, or perhaps it stood for Grand Union, but they denied both. A councilor afterwards suggested Growing Upward, but in vain. I presume it is the secret symbol of their organization, which nobody can know, but I venture one more guess—Gentlemanly Ushers! That is what they were, at any rate. One of them, who may be descended from Capt. John Smith, escorted me to the beautiful avenue close to the ocean, and there I found my little correspondent playing on the beach with seaweed, other children with sand wheelbarrows, and a fisherman repairing a lobster pot.

Of course you don't care about the "council," but I wish you could have heard what Dr. McKenzie said about Governor Winthrop as one of the greatest men Massachusetts ever had. (What do you know about him?) I am glad those children by the seaside are going to have not only a chapel and a Sunday school, but a church of their own, which, like Pomiuk, they can join in due time and rejoice in "a new name."

Mr. Martin

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

Another Verse from Anne Bradstreet. The Despotic Foreman left it out last week, and now he must restore it. It is from her poem on Spring, and is very pretty:

The primrose pale, and azure violet
Among the virduous grass hath nature set,
That when the Sun on his love, the earth, doth shine,
These might, as lace, set out her garment fine.
The fearfull bird his little house now builds
In trees and walls, in Cities and in fields.
The outside strong, the inside warm and neat:
A natural Artificer compleat.

Great Oaks. What troubles me still more, D. F. left out the items I had carefully written to follow our first American poet's beautiful stanza about the "stately Oak," and her query about its age. I wished you to have the note of another historic tree to add to your list given recently in the Scrap-book. In England it is far better known than our "Charter Oak," and has been the theme of many a British boy's composition. The day on which I write (May 29) is observed in the Church of England as the anniversary of the birth and also of the restoration of Charles II., and is called "Royal Oak Day." Oak branches are hung over the doorways, and children wear gilded oak leaves. It is, or was, in Boscobel, on the border between Shropshire and Staffordshire, in England, and sheltered King Charles II. in his flight from Cromwell after the battle of Worcester in 1651. Ask your grandparents if they remember the couplet in the "Primer,"

"The royal oak, it was the tree,
That saved his royal majesty."

Whether Anne Bradstreet's "stately Oak" is still standing I did not hear, but the historical preacher whom I heard at the Andover anniversary pointed, in his sermon, to a gnarled and venerable oak, into which some great man climbed at the beginning of the century to survey the landscape and decide where to build the new "Divinity College." The result of that climb was, from an Andover point of view, more important than for bad King Charles to escape from Oliver Cromwell!

A Royal Elm. I saw another large tree, while attending that anniversary, which has the advantage of knowing its age. For there was a tablet upon it saying that Captain Somebody brought it home with him on horseback when a sapling, about 1790, so that a "hundred winters" had surely passed since it was born. A lady in the pre-Revolutionary house under its shadow told me its circumference close to the board seat which surrounded its trunk was fifteen feet and three inches. I suppose that shows how fast an elm grows.

Older Than the Trees. This is positively the last item about that Andover anniversary. Made a part of the old-time collections in the school hall was a group of rocks, in the school yard, bearing the plain marks of the ancient glaciers as they moved over them. The boys added the marks of their boots as they slid down the sloping rocks, little thinking that icebergs from the land of Pomiuk had smoothed the rocks for them—about 10,000 years ago, as I understood Prof. G. F. Wright, the glacial scientist, to say. Better look out for "glacial scratches" on the rocks of your town.

LESSON FOR JUNE 21. Luke 24: 36–53.

THE RISEN LORD.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

The fact of the resurrection, which all the disciples disbelieved when it was first presented to them, all disciples of Christ now believe. The Christian Church is divided into many sects on many grounds, but in the belief in the resurrection of Christ it is agreed and always has been. That truth is so interwoven with Christianity that to deny it is either to deny Christianity or to surrender its claim to the confidence of reasonable men. The watchword of those who hope for life after death is: "Now hath Christ been raised from the dead, the first fruits of them that are asleep." This truth has created the church, has made the first day of the week the Christian Sabbath, has consecrated human affection by making it immortal and has planted a divine motive in the hearts of men. Of the topics concerning the resurrection which are brought forward by this lesson, we notice:

1. The empty tomb. This was the first fact in which the disciples, in their utter despondency, found hope. All that follows depends on that. A recent discovery at Jerusalem helps much to make the resurrection vivid. For several years Christian scholarship has been coming to an agreement that the mound north of the Damascus gate, described in our article on last week's lesson, is the place of the crucifixion. John says: "In the place where he was crucified there was a garden; and in the garden a new tomb. . . . There . . . they laid Jesus." Between the mound before mentioned and the Damascus road there is an inclosed space about the size of a garden. About three years ago a Christian missionary, reasoning that if Jesus was crucified on the mound his tomb might be found in the garden, undertook to explore for it. One day he thrust his cane into the side of the mound and discovered an opening. On digging away the earth a tomb was found. Our party entered it one April Sunday morning last year. It was the Sunday following the anniversary of Christ's resurrection. The same warm air of spring enveloped us as the first disciples breathed when our Lord came forth from the tomb. The grass grew green on the slopes of the Mount of Olives and the buds on the fig trees were swelling now as then. Passing down two or three steps at the outer entrance, we turn to the right and face the place where once, perhaps, the door was kept closed by a great stone rolled against it. Here one must stoop down in order to look into the tomb, which must have belonged to a rich man, for it cost much money, being cut into solid limestone rock. A descent of seven or eight steps brings us to the floor of the tomb. There are several loculi or places to receive dead bodies, but it is evident that only one was ever occupied. The others are still unfinished. On the walls are carved the early Christian symbols, the cross, with the Greek letters Alpha and Omega, indicating that it had been used as a place of prayer. It is said that the form of the letter Alpha was peculiar to the first Christian century. On a tomb close by was found a Greek inscription saying that the occupant had been buried as he had requested, near the place where his Lord had lain. While those who have examined the place are not fully confident that it was the tomb of Jesus, it meets in several respects the descriptions of that tomb in the gospels. It was surely in such a tomb and close at hand that Jesus lay, and out of such a place that he came forth on that resurrection morning. The emotions stirred by standing beside the door of that tomb and gazing on that scene are not easily described.

2. The risen Christ manifested. From the tomb beyond the city wall to the room in which the eleven disciples were gathered on that same Sunday in the evening it was only a few minutes' walk. There they were talking about their risen Lord and his appearance to Peter when the two disciples with whom he had walked to Emmaus came in and told of the wonderful things they had witnessed. Then Jesus himself appeared with words of benediction on his lips. But his salutation of peace brought no peace to them. Like many since they thought more of the strangeness of his presence than of its meaning, and in terror supposed him to be a ghost.

But Jesus regarded their doubt as natural, even if not reasonable. He did not rebuke them, but furnished to their senses undeniable evidence that he was indeed present with them. He made them touch him, that they might see that his was a real body. He made them look at his pierced hands and feet, that they might know that it was the same body which had been nailed to the cross. And when the truth seemed still too sweet and wonderful to be true, he ate food before them, that they might see that he subjected himself to the same natural laws which governed their bodies.

Whoever desires to do the will of God wants the resurrection to be true, for it brings to us not only the assurance of the immortal life but of eternal fellowship with Jesus Christ in the realms of the blessed. The evidences he has furnished of the resurrection seem to be as convincing as could be made. They are his own distinct and repeated prophecies before his crucifixion that he would rise from the dead, the utter hopelessness of the disciples after his death, and their glad acknowledgment that the resurrection was a fact only after they had touched him and seen and talked and eaten with him.

3. The gospel of the resurrection in the Old Testament. The last ten verses of the gospel of Luke summarize the sayings of Christ during the interval between the resurrection and the ascension. He told his disciples that the Old Testament testified of him, and that the things written in it concerning him "must needs be fulfilled." Neither the word "immortal" nor the phrase "eternal life" is to be found in the Old Testament. But though the Scriptures did not mention eternal life, Christ said that they taught it, because they testified of him who had it and bestowed it [John 5: 39]. He showed them that the Scriptures and the religion which they taught were all a preparation for his coming. He demanded of his disciples belief in the three great miracles foretold in the Old Testament: his birth, his person and his resurrection. Of his birth he said, "I am come down from heaven"; and he spoke of himself as "he that descended out of heaven, even the Son of Man." Of his person he said that, like God, he had life in himself, power essential, inalienable and complete over death. Of his resurrection, he had declared that he was to pass through death and be buried, and that on the third day he would rise from the dead; that he would do this of his own will and choice, though at the hands of sinful men; that he would go and prepare a place for his disciples in his Father's house and would come again and receive them to himself. The Scriptures, he said, anticipated all these things.

4. The gift of the risen Christ to his disciples. They were to tarry in Jerusalem till they received the Holy Spirit, and then to begin their testimony. They were to see its effect in the same gift upon those who received their message, and to find in this the evidence of the fitness of their hearers to enter into the new covenant, thus becoming members of the Christian Church. The evidence that the gift had been received would be unmistakable. No man, Paul said, could call Jesus his Lord but in the Holy Spirit. This is our preparation to do the work for which our Master has commissioned us, and this is our assurance that we have received power from on high. His Spirit opens our understanding that we may know the Scriptures, kindles love to the brethren and creates a controlling desire to make all men brethren through fellowship with Christ.

5. The Saviour ascended. The resurrection had confirmed to the disciples his promise, "Because I live, ye shall live also." But the ascension guaranteed to them the fulfillment of his prayer, "I will that, where I am, they also may be with me, that they may behold my glory." After that they needed only the gift of the Holy Spirit to equip them to go to all nations with their glorious tidings. It was natural that they should wait for this in the temple, and that while waiting they should be moved to joyful praise.

In these final instructions of Christ to his disciples we find the equipment we need to serve him with large success—an equipment not reserved for the apostles only nor bestowed at a particular time in the history of the church, but open now to the humblest follower of Christ, who may receive power to witness to the salvation purchased by Christ's blood for all mankind.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

OUR OWN WORK.

Grateful Japanese. The cordial relations existing between the authorities of the Orphanage at Okayama, a thoroughly Japanese institution, and its friends among our American Board missionaries have recently been made known to the world by act and by public declaration, very gratifying to the friends of the Japan mission. Some missionary residences, held in the name of the Doshisha, have been purchased by the Orphanage and removed to its own grounds, and one has been set apart for missionary use. Mr. Pettee, our Japanese correspondent, has been from the first not only one of the warmest friends of this institution, but, in the opinion of the Japanese authorities, its chief benefactor, and their gratitude is shown in a public statement declaring their intention to reserve one building as a residence for this missionary. We quote a part of the document: "It has been our long-cherished hope that even should the American Board close up its work in Japan, not sending hither a single missionary, we may keep Mr. Pettee and his family in Okayama. We will gladly assume his support when able to do so as our thank offering to God and in acknowledgment of the service of our benefactor, hoping that he may labor for the spread of the gospel in our country until his locks are completely white, his loins bent and his limbs feeble with age. We therefore have no desire ever to receive any rent whatever from Mr. Pettee, or any missionary who may take his place." While this step was actuated largely by personal reasons, the friends of the Board, whose faith in Japanese Christians has been somewhat disturbed by the attitude of the Doshisha toward Christianity, will find relief and comfort in such acts as this of Mr. Ishii and his coworkers.

Movements Toward Self-Support. Undoubted evidence of sincere religious interest is seen in the loosening of purse-strings, and we note with encouragement in the current Missionary Herald reports of increased efforts toward self-support on the part of native Christians and inquirers. Not only has the past year been the most fruitful ever known on the Marshall Islands, Micronesia, in respect to additions to the church, which have numbered 400, but the contributions of these poor islanders in a year of scarcity have amounted to $987, sufficient to pay the salaries of all the preachers and teachers. Moreover, Dr. Whitney, writing of the remarkable religious movement in the Foochow Mission, says: "One interesting and hopeful feature in this interest is the readiness of inquirers to give toward the support of preachers and school teachers if we will furnish men to enlighten them. In two or three places in my field the inquirers alone are willing to furnish a house and contribute enough to support an ordinary preacher. This is a remarkable thing for China." Mr. Beard reports that the First Church in Foochow has promised to be responsible for all its running expenses, besides paying the pastor's salary, and says that other churches are also making effectual progress in the matter of self-support.

THE WORLD AROUND.

Letter from Clara Barton. An extract from a private letter to Dr. Judson Smith recently written by Miss Clara Barton gives additional information to that furnished by her to our readers last week, as well as a pleasant glimpse of the devout personality of this remarkable woman, and contains a hearty word of appreciation of our missionaries. After telling of the efforts being made to free the distressed Armenians from the new enemy which threatens them, the plague, she writes: "The distance is so great, communications so difficult, that the work seems slow. And yet when I compare the conditions of today with two and a half months ago, at which time we entered Constantinople, new to everything, strange, doubtful, unknowing and unknown, I feel that I need not be quite discouraged. I make my requests here as freely as I should do in our own country and they are as promptly and kindly met as they would be there. It seems to me that the blessing of heaven is resting on the work we are all trying, however inadequately, to do. My sympathies so go out toward these worn, tired missionary men and women who have struggled so long, borne so much so bravely and so well. It cannot be all in vain, and again daily and hourly I thank our heavenly Father for the little temporary help that it may have been in the power of myself and mine to bring to them."

Methodists in Africa and Southern Asia. At the Methodist General Conference, recently held in Cleveland, Missionary Bishops William Taylor and J. M. Thoburn gave in person reports of the unique work of which they have charge. Bishop Taylor called attention to the fact that, until recent years, all the appropriations of the Methodist Missionary Society for Africa were applied to the Americo-Liberia work and laid special emphasis on the new mission stations among the wild heathen which he has planted. He thus describes his methods: "In opening a station we make it a point to secure a high, healthy site and good land for agricultural purposes and make simple industries, involving self-support, an essential part of education. Our plan is also to establish a nursery mission in every station over which we have a competent missionary matron." In the work among the "raw heathen," to use Bishop Taylor's phraseology, there are now twenty-seven principal stations and nearly as many more substations manned by forty-eight white missionaries and having hundreds of natives under training. The Methodist Church has in Africa today forty-two churches, with 4,403 members, sixty-two preachers and eighty-four Sunday schools.

Bishop Thoburn pointed out the remarkable progress made in India and Malaysia during the four years since his last report to the conference. The Methodist Church now has twenty-four district conferences in India and Malaysia and has workers preaching in sixteen different languages. At the close of 1895 the total community of the church in this field was more than 100,000 souls, showing an increase of over 1,000 a month during four years. The proportion of souls saved to the amount of money expended has been very large, and of the character of the converts Bishop Thoburn says: "When due allowance is made for the previous ignorance and lifelong habits of the people, we find but little cause of discouragement in the condition of those who are looking to us for spiritual guidance. They are not a fickle people nor are they the converts of a day. It has recently been stated that forty per cent. of your probationers in the United States are lost to the church within twelve months from the date of their reception, whereas our brethren in India have thus far been able to keep within their lines eighty-four per cent. of their converts, only sixteen per cent. permanently disappearing from our rolls." Other indications of growth and prosperity are the 2,000 native teachers and preachers, the 560 Bible readers, the 2,249 Sunday schools with an enrollment of nearly 72,000 pupils, and the 134 chapters of the Epworth League having 6,555 members. One of the most encouraging signs of a genuine Christian life is found in the remarkable stimulus which has recently been given to the cause of self-support among converts who are perhaps the poorest in this world's goods of any Christians on the globe, according to the good bishop.

More Economy in Mission Work. While expressing no lack of sympathy for the financial embarrassments under which our missionary boards are struggling, an editorial in The Japan Evangelist suggests that it may be possible to turn the present situation to account for the improvement of missionary organizations and ecclesiastical bodies as well as the strengthening of individual workers and believers. Denominationalism involves a tremendous waste of energy and means, which might be economized through co-operation. If the reduced income of mission boards will stimulate the growing desire for interdenominational comity and federation, great good will come out of apparent evil. Certain phases of missionary work, such as the creation and development of Christian literature, are peculiarly favorable for co-operative enterprise. In foreign lands there is no pressing need for giving a denominational complexion to Sunday school lesson helps, tracts and translations of helpful books, and the Evangelist declares that "no effort should be spared to avoid the unnecessary expenditure of time, energy, men and means in creating and almost necessarily subsidizing separate publishing and other outfits, if there is any possibility of effecting arrangements by which one self-supporting concern, conducted in the interests of co-operating parties, could be established."

PEN AND SCISSORS.

An interesting article on the Education of Women in Turkey, which appears in the June Forum, is by Miss Mary Mills Patrick, the talented president of the American College for Girls in Constantinople.

The nurses' training school in Kyoto, commenced and carried on by Dr. Berry, has passed wholly into the hands of the Japanese. Including the thirteen members of the graduating class there will have been sent out seventy-five nurses, only one of whom has graduated without becoming a Christian. The American Board may well be proud of this record.

For the first time in the history of the native Christian community in India, one of its prominent members, Mr. Subrahmanyam, has been honored by being appointed to the responsible position of government pleader. He has been president of the Madras Native Christian Association since its organization, is a member of the Madras Christian College and a fellow of the Madras University. His new government office has previously been occupied by Europeans with one exception.

BOOK REVIEWS.

BIBLICAL STUDY.

The Book of the Twelve Prophets, by Prof. George Adam Smith of Glasgow, is the latest addition to the series of commentaries known as The Expositor's Bible. The first volume, covering Amos, Hosea and Micah, is before us. The introduction is a brief and careful discussion of the history of prophecy in Israel. Amos is characterized as the prophet judge denouncing Israel for her wickedness. The book is assigned to the middle of the eighth century. The genuineness of the three doxologies [Amos 4: 13; 5: 8, 9; 9: 5, 6] is discussed and the arguments for both sides of the question presented, though Professor Smith decides at last against it. He is especially happy in his study of Hosea. Accepting the picture of the prophet's life as actual fact, he brings out the nobility and spiritual development of his character, and pronounces him the Old Testament counterpart of Christ. He accepts the epilogue of Hosea on account of its harmony with the rest of the book. Micah is called the prophet of the poor. There is a valuable historical review of the criticism of Micah which shows that at present the tendency is to refer almost the whole of it to him. Chapter 7: 7–20 is carefully examined and analyzed into several sections.

In all these prophecies Professor Smith finds messages not only for Israel but for us. He refers especially to present social and economic conditions. In the preface he states that he has been attacked for making such a use of Scripture and defends his position. We heartily agree with him. Otherwise the Bible would lose a great part of its value.

This book is a valuable critical study. Biblical criticism is not only the result of Biblical study, but it furnishes the great incentive thereto. Witness the present increasing activity and zeal and the resultant literature. The volumes of this series are by various authors and necessarily of varying merit. This one stands in the first rank in scholarship and helpfulness. [A. C. Armstrong & Son. $1.50.]

In the Modern Reader's Bible The Book of Job is edited, with an introduction and notes by Prof. Richard G. Moulton. Of all the books in the canon this has perhaps the most purely literary interest. It is of Israel, and yet not of Israel. It deals with the deepest problems of God and of suffering, and deals with them as no other poem of the world has ever done, and the study of its literary relationships is of the most fascinating interest.

Professor Moulton has made a beautiful and valuable book, with a skillful and illuminating introduction and an arrangement of rhythmic form that helps the eye. The few changes of order and ascription of utterance to the different speakers seem to be justified by the evidently greater clearness of the result, and the notes, which the dramatic form and spirit of the epic may justify us in calling "stage directions," are extremely suggestive and helpful. It is the best edition we have seen of perhaps the greatest poem in all literature, which should be read and reread as a whole, with the editor's guidance and help. [Macmillan & Co. 50 cents.]

In the same series comes Ecclesiastes and The Wisdom of Solomon under the same able editing. Joining together these Biblical and Apocryphal books, Professor Moulton is able to show how they stand for the second, or wider, phase of the wisdom literature. The analysis and comparison are very interesting, and, while there is much fighting ground to be gone over, the arrangement of the material which the editor gives reduces the books to a consistent and intelligible order. [Macmillan & Co. 50 cents.]

A History of the Hebrew People, by Prof. Charles F. Kent of Brown University, aims to put together the results of recent critical study and to present them to the educated public. It purposely avoids argument and gives a clear picture of the development of the Hebrew nation in accordance with the views of the moderate critics. The author closely follows their results and any criticism of the book would necessarily involve that of the whole school. The great body of modern scholars now holds this position and instruction therein is provided for in many of our colleges. This book is especially fitted for a reference and text book for such classes. The first volume brings us to the building of the temple and the second volume, which is expected in the fall, will complete the history up to the captivity. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.]

The Testimony of the Land to the Book, or the Evidential Value of Palestine, by Rev. David Gregg, D. D. This book is made up of three lectures delivered at the New England Chautauqua on The Fascination of the Land, The Voices from Above Ground and The Voices from Underground. It will be helpful in suggesting the rich field of illustration which Palestine affords to the Bible student. [E. B. Treat. 35 cents.]

RELIGIOUS.

The Expansion of Religion, by E. Winchester Donald. These lectures were delivered before the Lowell Institute by Dr. Donald, and are, as he says in his noticeably brief preface, "the record of a working clergyman's sober thinking upon a subject, profound interest in which is coterminous with the life of man."

Dr. Donald's thought is conversant with the best results of recent scientific and sociological thinking. He stands for righteousness between men in business relations, the longest of the lectures being that on Religion and Industrialism. "Religion, instead of giving herself wholly or even mainly to the task of establishing justice by enactment," he says, "has thrown herself into the work of making men just," and he points out that religion is on the side of individualism first and then of organization, which is a wholesome statement in the face of a socialism which too often forgets that a community of ciphers amounts to nothing but a cipher after all. We believe in the large-minded optimism which finds expression in the book and find it a hopeful symptom of the times. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50.]

Through the Eternal Spirit, by James Elder Cumming, D. D. This book upon the Holy Spirit is declared by F. B. Meyer, who writes a preface for it, to "burn throughout with the fire of a devout and holy soul." Dr. Cumming is without question an earnest Christian man, and he shows here an exhaustive knowledge of Biblical passages concerning the Holy Ghost. But that he understands thus fully Biblical teachings upon this august theme the book does not prove. The author is a literalist, who holds the Bible to be an inspired record, not the record of inspired men. The church since the first few generations, he says, "has ceased to cherish, to teach and almost to adore the Holy Ghost." The great body of Christians are quite astray in the matter of sanctification, vainly thinking it to be a growth; whereas, did they realize and receive the truth which he would fain teach them here about the Holy Ghost, they would become holy at once. By the anointing of the Holy Ghost they would also receive direct knowledge of and from God. On the whole, we are inclined to wish that such devout and holy souls as this author might recognize that they are still of the same frail, erring race as the rest of us, or at least say, Christianus sum; Christiani nihil a me alienum puto. [Fleming H. Revell Co. $1.50.]

Heaven; Six Sermons by Rev. Richard Montague, D. D., with Memorials by Rev. George E. Merrill, D. D., and Rev. Alvah Hovey, D. D. This book is a tribute of affection and admiration to a man whose work was too soon cut short by death. The sermons give some idea of his pulpit earnestness and power, which is borne out by the memorial essay. A good portrait is prefixed to the book. [Silver, Burdett & Co. $1.25.]

The Greater Life and Work of Christ, as revealed in Scripture, man and nature, by Alexander Patterson. The author of this book deliberately robs it of all value in regard to at least one-third of his subject—the work of Christ in nature—by taking the position that he "rests upon Scripture alone for all final conclusions, feeling that this is the court of last resort in all revealed truth." As between the practically unanimous opinion of all modern students of nature that the process of creation is an evolutionary process and Mr. Patterson's explicit denial that Christ's work is done on evolutionary lines, we are forced to decide that this book is so far valueless. And yet he says that "the history of Christ in Scripture is a development." The book is devout, spiritually suggestive, touched at many points by modern thought, but upon the most suggestive side of its great theme totally blind and misleading. It is behind the age also in its total lack of an index. [Fleming H. Revell Co. $1.50.]

Old Faiths and New Facts, by William W. Kingley. The author's treatment is utterly inadequate to the profound importance of the three great themes which he handles: Science and Prayer, Science and Christ, Science and the Life Beyond. The valuable truths stated might well have been presented in one-fourth the space, and the surfeit of rhetoric which surrounds them might well have given place to careful investigation. The religion of our Lord demands more thorough and competent advocacy. Although about two-thirds of the book has appeared in the Bibliotheca Sacra and about one-third in the Chautauqua course of reading, the favorable judgment which these facts raised in our mind was reversed, we regret to say, by a personal examination. [D. Appleton. $1.50.]

STORIES.

Pirate Gold, by F. J. Stimson (J. S. of Dale), is a well-told and touching story of the love of a staid, commonplace bookkeeper for the daughter of a captured pirate. As a child she is placed in his care, and when she grows into a young lady whom he longs to marry he finds her regarding him as a father, and he strives to be reconciled to her marriage to a gay young man who proves to be a miserable scamp. We have few more pathetic pictures than this of Jamie McMurtagh depriving himself of every luxury and of one comfort after another in order to pay back money which, for love's sake, he took from his employer's safe. Incidentally, there are glimpses of Boston in the exciting ante-bellum days when abolitionism was a burning question. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25.]

A Little Wizard is by Stanley J. Weyman. It is a story of the wars of the Commonwealth times, contrasting the darker features of both parties. The hero is a child, and one feels, in spite of the power of the narrative, that it is almost too somber, and that the burden put upon childhood is too great for the proportion of art. Cromwell appears in the end of the book and his character is finely drawn. [R. F. Fenno & Co. 50 cents.]

The chronicles of an English barrister's vacation serve as basis for the story entitled In Search of Quiet, by Walter Frith. It is written in the form of a journal and abounds in pleasing pictures of rural life. The characterization, also, is clever, but the unwholesome intensity of the book and its questionable ethics neutralize its otherwise good points. [Harper & Bros. $1.25.]

Susannah, by Mary E. Mann, is neither a pleasant nor a profitable novel. Several scenes of a rather sensational character are laid in a cheap London lodging house, where the heroine has placed herself in the disguise of a maid of all work in order to care for an invalid brother, as weak morally as he is physically. It must be admitted, however, that the book has power to sustain the reader's interest from beginning to end, and now and then a character, such as that of the pious and wealthy widow who starves her household for the sake of her pet charities, is well drawn. [Harper & Bros. $1.25.]

A Fight with Fate by Mrs. Alexander is a well-written but somewhat sensational novel of English social life. The principal characters are a handsome scheming widow, a young nobleman of shady character, a beautiful girl supposed to be obscure and penniless, and a rich old gentleman who appears opportunely as her granduncle and delivers her from the intriguing widow, who has employed the girl as her private secretary. The plot is transparent from the beginning and the story ends, as usual with this author, in most felicitous fashion. The nobleman mends his morals, marries the heiress to her uncle's wealth and bliss and prosperity crown their union. [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.25.]

An Engagement, by Sir Robert Peel. This is an engagement not of war but love, but may serve to illustrate the old saying that all's fair in both. Given a girl who is supposed to love her lover, a lover who pretends to be engaged to another girl to further his own fortunes, with that girl's free consent, a lazy, good-natured nobleman with influence and an intriguing mother, and you have the elements of a bright and harmless story. The frontispiece is much the worst thing in the book. [Frederick A. Stokes Co. 50 cents.]

PSYCHOLOGY AND ETHICS.

Psychology and Psychic Culture, by Reuben P. Halleck. A great amount of wisdom is packed into this little book. The arrangement of the material is sensible, following a natural order, which assists the mastery of the contents. The author is a practical teacher, who believes not only that psychology can be made interesting to young people under twenty years of age, but that it can be studied most profitably when the mind is in a plastic state. The physiological department of the subject is treated first; here the illustrations are numerous and helpful. The fundamental facts of consciousness and attention lead to chapters on perception, memory, imagination, thought, feeling and will. To a descriptive analysis of each faculty there is added a chapter or section on its cultivation. In view of the great amount of bathos which has been published in the name of psychology, it is refreshing to find a book like this, so distinctly marked by clear style, good judgment and common sense. [American Book Co. $1.25.]

An Ethical Movement, by W. L. Sheldon. Here are lectures on morals, with so little basis of religion that a personal God may or may not be involved. The author inclines to call his deity it rather than he. Christ is to him an ethical ideal—beautiful, but defective in the strong virtues.

When humanity learns to breathe in a vacuum the teachings of this book may be generally accepted, but not before. Mr. Sheldon enumerates twelve ethical precepts of Jesus which he would tie about his neck; but he needs, and so do we all, to begin further back with "God be merciful to me the sinner." [Macmillan. $1.75.]

Studies in the Thought World; or Practical Mind Art, by Henry Wood. This book begins with two highly enjoyable Emersonian essays on Ownership through Idealism and the Evolutionary Climb of Man. They disarm us of any prejudice given by the sub-title. We soon find the author to be an uncompromising foe of materialism, but somewhat over-ready to quote sporadic physical scientists in favor of spiritualistic phenomena. A little further and we are committed to a discussion of "mind cure." To deny that Mr. Wood presents in a charming way many stimulating and valuable thoughts about the dominance of mind over body would be as ungrateful as untrue. But to overlook a certain lack of moderation in the use of a valuable truth would be as unfair as uncritical. That there is no such thing in this world as objective evil—so no right and wrong, no sin and forgiveness—is counter to the consensus of intelligent opinion. That theological dogma, in the sense of ordinary religious teaching, unites with materialistic science in regarding man as a material being is not true. That materia medica tend to degrade man into animalism is at least an extravagant assertion. One of the happiest suggestions of the book is upon our ability to determine the nature of our sub-conscious mind by allowing only wholesome thoughts to pass through into this vast reservoir of our being, the nature of which so vitally affects our history. [Lee & Shepard. $1.25.]

Moral Law and Civil Law Parts of the Same Thing, by Eli F. Ritter. This book is an argument to prove that liquor licenses are essentially immoral, but its argument seems to us fundamentally unsound. The state limits individual rights; it does not grant them, and licenses were originally limitations of a generally exercised right. This fallacy of statement vitiates the whole argument of the book. Advance in temperance cannot be permanently helped by false logic. [Hunt & Eaton. 90 cents.]

LITERARY STUDY.

Shakspere and His Predecessors, by Frederick S. Boas, M. A. Much the larger part of this book is given to Shakespeare and his work under different headings: Shakspere in Stratford, in London, Italianate, the Golden Prince of Comedy, the Problem Plays and other titles. The introductory chapters on the Predecessors is especially valuable. The book is written in a pleasant, sometimes rather fanciful, style, is full of scholarly knowledge and has a vital grasp of its theme. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1 50 net.]

Two commendable features of A History of American Literature, by Prof. F. L. Pattee of Pennsylvania College, are its compact, yet clear, arrangement and the amount of fresh matter which is introduced, thus bringing the book up to date and making it interesting to the general reader as well as to the pupil in school or college. A classified list of reference books, including the latest publications, and a good index add to its value. [Silver, Burdett & Co. $1.50.] ——From the same firm comes Topical Notes on American Authors, by Lucy Tappan, a teacher in the Gloucester High School. She has selected a dozen of our most characteristic authors and by means of choice extracts from their writings, together with voluminous and suggestive notes, has made a helpful guide to the study of American literature. A list of recent magazine articles, giving fresh glimpses of these men, accompanies the usual list of reference books. [$1.00.]

Other Classics for Children are Selections from Epictetus, abridged by Edward Ginn. White's Natural History of Selborne, with an introduction by Edward S. Morse (abridged). [Ginn & Co. Each 50 cents.] ——Paradise Lost (Books I. and II.). The Life of Samuel Johnson, by Macaulay. The Rhyme of the Ancient Mariner, by S. T. Coleridge. Revolt of the Tartars, by Thomas De Quincey. Conciliation with the American Colonies, by Edmund Burke. These are all well printed and bound in paper boards with cloth backs. [American Book Co. Each 20 cents.]——Grimm's Fairy Tales. Part II. Edited by Sarah E. Wiltse, illustrated by Caroline S. King and printed in large type. [Ginn & Co. 45 cents.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

The White Mountains, by Julius H. Ward, is a revised and enlarged edition of a valuable book. In it we are shown the relation of the White Mountain system to the surrounding country, the groupings of the various peaks, the different lines of approach, and particulars concerning the tramps which every able-bodied White Mountain enthusiast is sure to take. We notice that he says of the scramble up King's Ravine, "It exceeds in difficulty any mountain climbing that I have ever attempted"; also that he considers the view from Mt. Adams "in some respects finer than that from Mt. Washington." Without being a guide book, this is just such a guide as one needs in the mountains, helping one to understand their relations, showing how to see them at the best advantage and giving trustworthy information of the difficulties and fatigue to be encountered in making the various ascents. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25.]

Dr. C. C. Abbott is well known as a writer of books on outdoor subjects. His latest volume, Notes of the Night and Other Outdoor Sketches, is full of keen appreciation of nature in all her manifestations, and gives the results of careful and patient observation. The opening essay gives the title to the book, while the others tell of daytime rambles and studies. The last chapter is a defense of Thoreau, of whom Dr. Abbott is a reverent follower. [New York: Century Co. $1.50.]

An interesting series of books of value to the student of modern problems comprises The Spoils System, by Carl Schurz, The Scholar in Politics, by Hon. Richard Olney, Secretary of State, and two by Edward W. Bok, The Young Man in Business and The Young Man and the Church. They are bound in white and gold and well printed. [Henry Altemus. 30 cents each.]

School Recreations and Amusements, by Charles W. Mann, dean of the Chicago Academy, is a book for teachers, and covers the ground suggested by its title very comprehensively. The teacher who is really interested in the life and pleasures of his pupils will find it full of practical suggestions. [American Book Co. $1.00.]

The Mystery of Handwriting, a handbook of graphology, by J. Harrington Keene (Grapho), illustrated with portraits and autographs of celebrated persons. This is devoted to one of the byways of knowledge, and while the author takes himself very seriously he does not claim to have reduced his science to the exactness of mathematics. While we have found some suggestive things in the book and like the author's enthusiasm, we have found room for many smiles in the space between some of his premises and conclusions. For instance: "I have always been able to distinguish the malicious person by the crossing of the t being at the extreme end or tip of the letter with an upward tendency," and "melancholy — the saddened and pessimistic character—is indicated by a downward tendency of the writing toward the right-hand lower corner. This is an infallible sign." [Lee & Shepard. $2.00.]

Whist Laws and Whist Decisions, by Maj.-Gen. A. W. Drayson. This is a book of rules and illustrative cases—a valuable contribution to the increasing literature of the game. [Harper & Brothers. $1.00.]

NOTES.

— Cornell has followed the fashion of the times in removing all speeches by members of the graduating class from its Commencement program.

— The Poe cottage at Fordham, New York, is to be removed to a piece of public property which is to be laid out as a park and called by the poet's name. A bronze statue of Poe will be erected and the cottage kept open as a memorial.

— The loss of Johns Hopkins University through the Baltimore & Ohio bankruptcy seems to have been a determining factor in President Gilman's decision not to go to New York. The railroad failure means a loss of $50,000 income to the university.

— Professor Cook of Yale has offered a prize of $50 for the best unpublished poem of not more than one hundred lines upon some subject connected with history or art. The competition is open to all students of the university, and the date of handing in the poems is May 15, 1897.

— New York's opportunity to secure a public library building which in position and influence should be the rival of that in Boston seems to have come with the signing of the bill granting the aqueduct site to the trustees of the united libraries. Such an architectural and educational chance is not likely to recur for a generation, and we hope it may be wisely employed.

— The Publisher's Weekly is responsible for the statement that for three years the number of books published in France has been steadily decreasing. It adds: "The United States has now a literary output about half as large as France. And yet we cannot help thinking that if our publishers selected in such nice fashion that two books a day of even this output might fall out for the coming year, readers, publishers, and, above all, booksellers would be immensely benefited."

— The temptation to slur America seems to be almost irresistible to the English and Scotch literary man. Here is even Barrie, in his current story in Scribner's, comparing an inconclusive courting to "an American novel in several volumes." We suppose it must be Mr. Henry James that he is thinking of, for he has long lived in London and perhaps prints his novels there in several volumes, but what permanent literary value have such hasty generalizations to atone for their irritating quality?

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, June 21–27. Doubts and Difficulties. Ps. 40: 1–17.

It does not pay to go out of one's way to discover doubts and difficulties, and the only advantage in talking about them is that they may grow less troublesome. Discussion that does not throw some measure of light upon them is but waste of time. On the other hand, if we are seeking not so much the exercise of our argumentative powers as real solutions of our problems, there are few ways in which we can aid one another more than by a frank statement of our troubles and a free exchange of views in regard to them.

Doubts are of all kinds and sizes, but one or two general principles of treatment apply fairly well to them all. First, do not be ashamed of your doubts. So long as Jesus called to immediate association with himself one whose chief distinction is the fact that he was a doubter, none of us need feel that we are disqualified for fellowship with Christ and other Christians because our mental make-up is similar to that of Thomas. A doubt may be the first step toward a higher life. An age too inert to doubt is too stagnant to make any progress. The best Christians have not always seen truth clearly nor has their path heavenward been an unimpeded and flower-strewn way. Some of us come by our doubts honestly enough. Perhaps we inherit them. Perhaps our temperament inclines us toward them. Perhaps we have been unfortunate in our contact with the world and have encountered more to arouse in us the skeptical spirit than those whose lives have been more sheltered. At any rate, a doubt honestly come by and not due to any moral failing is not to be blushed over or to be buried.

But it is equally a mistake to boast of one's doubts. There comes a period in almost every boy's life when he thinks it smart to smoke or to swagger about in fine clothes, and there is often a corresponding time in the mental development of the young man and the young woman when it pleases them a little to think themselves infected with the skeptical ideas current in society. They dip into a shallow and sophistical book and are taken with the plausible reasoning, forgetting what Bacon says, that "a little reading may incline one to skepticism, but deeper thinking and reasoning brings him back to faith." No, doubts are not to be coddled and to be displayed as marks of superior intelligence, as evidences that we are no longer tied to our mother's apron strings. It is always sad to hear a person speaking lightly of the beliefs in which he was trained, which, however much he may enlarge and enrich them in future years, are the best heritage that his father and mother can bequeath him. Do not aspire to be a heretic. It takes a pretty good man to be that, or, at least, to be such a one as coming ages will delight to honor. Most of us ordinary mortals are likely to have our heads turned by any temporary notoriety that our real or fancied heresies can secure for us.

After all, the best cure for doubt is to keep the moral and spiritual forces of one's life moving at full steam. It is possible for a man to do that, even though sorely perplexed with reference to the orthodoxy of this or that belief, even though his creed is reduced to the simplicity of the blind man's creed. Professor Drummond puts it in his own terse, telling way when he says that no man has a right to postpone his life for the sake of his belief. The main question is, are we living serious, reverent and self-sacrificing lives. If we are and if we have come to see how full the present moment may be of moral enthusiasm and spiritual elevation our doubts will cease to bother us, we shall be in a position to help those still struggling in darkness and shall come at last to fuller light and knowledge.

The Home Missionary Society's Annual Conclave.

New Haven, Ct., June 2-4.

Doubtless God could make more beautiful June days, but would men deserve such joy? Doubtless God could produce more perfect, beautiful elms and array them in richer verdure than that which today makes the Elm City a revelation to those whom duty or fate compel to live on arid plains or treeless city wastes, but will he? Breezes from the Sound made the air cool and bracing. Light shot down from the bluest of skies, percolated through masses of greenest leaves, refined by

GEN. O O. HOWARD
President

the process and made more suitable for the eye.

Seated in the venerable, historic Center Church, with its dignified, chaste, typical interior, one heard outside the chatter of birds and the faint hum of life of a great city, and yet felt isolated and surrounded by the spirits of the great and good. Instead of the effervescing waters of Saratoga, instead of her great caravansaries, instead of her evanescent crowds of worldlings and health seekers, we had glimpses of fountains of learning, draughts from wellsprings of wisdom and the opportunity to study the intensely interesting panorama of modern university life.

Graduates of Yale College and the Divinity School enjoyed the opportunity to revisit old haunts, note the marked changes since graduation and pay homage to former instructors. Parents with sons studying in New Haven had a chance to do some domestic missionary work while hearing about home missions, and parents with sons about to enter college, or college bred men about to enter some divinity school, could study Yale's defects and virtues. Last, but not least, seminary professors came in touch with men of action, and men on the frontier sat at the feet of sages.

For these, if for no other reasons, the society could be congratulated on deciding to substitute New Haven for Saratoga as the place of this year's meeting. But there are other reasons why the choice was most fitting. Connecticut, in 1798, established the pioneer State missionary society. The First Church in New Haven, as early as 1645, sent forty bushels of good wheat to Harvard College to support students for the Christian ministry, and in 1792 the same church — now the Center Church, where the meetings were held—sent support for "missionaries in the Northwest," the Northwest then being northern and central New York, and Vermont. Hence it was opportune that at the close of seventy years of its history the society should celebrate its anniversary on the soil of the section of the country whence it sprang, and from which it ever has and still must most of its sinews of war, and in the ancient commonwealth where home missionary work was first and so early organized

SERMON, AND SALUTATIONS.

Vice-president Webb—Rev. Dr. E. B. Webb—called the society to order Tuesday evening, responding briefly and fittingly to the words of salutation which came later, and remained in that office until Wednesday evening, when Gen. O. O. Howard, the president, took up the reins. Both Dr. Webb and General Howard kept the speakers within their time limits, and the hearers in their proper places, with a precision and authority admirable to see.

The pastor of the Center Church, Rev. Dr. Newman Smyth, was felicitous in setting forth the reasons why New Haven Congregationalists, and especially those of Center Church, felt it a privilege to entertain the society; and President Dwight of Yale University, in a tender, feeling way, made known the peculiar satisfaction that he, as president of a university which has sent so many young men into the home missionary work, felt in believing that not a little of their success was due to the life at Yale.

The sermon by Rev. Dr. Daniel Merriman of Worcester, from the text, Acts 2: 17, "And your sons and your daughters shall prophesy," was unusually fine in its beauty of diction and skillful marshaling of facts, and in its vivid portrayal of tendencies in the life of today within and without the church. Optimistic in so far as it set forth the glory of past, present and future exercise of the prophetic function, it was somewhat pessimistic in its delineation of the drift of events today. Just in his depiction of the ancient, ever-present contest between priests and ecclesiastical politicians and God's prophets, and in his analysis of the principles which made the English Puritans and Pilgrims what they were, fearful lest Congregationalists of today sell their birthright, or cease to be prophets, teachers, preachers, missionaries, Dr. Merriman insisted that others should be left to do the baptizing, the magnifying of ecclesiastical machinery, but Congregationalists must make more powerful and luminous the function of prophesying, for the "heart of missions is here. A story to tell, a judgment to pronounce, a hope to offer—all so incorporated in the personality of the herald that he is the story, the judgment, the hope to those to whom he speaks. This is the ancient and open secret, this the perennial power of missions. Nothing else can be substituted for this. Everything else—institution, system, polity, rite—is incidental and subsidiary to this. The less that comes between the soul and God the better."

DR. E. B. WEBB

Dr. Merriman dwelt much and trenchantly upon the dangers which we face as a people, growing out of unassimilated foreign immigration, the absence of moral restraint in the home, the decay of family virtue, the lack of child nurture today, the materialistic spirit which pervades most of the literature of socialism, minimizing the spectacle of the cross, exalting the division of the loaves and fishes and reducing Jesus to the place of a social demagogue, assisting in doling out food and wages, the growth of luxury and the spirit of gambling and the deterioration of the quality of our State and national legislatures, reflecting, he believes, a like deterioration in the constituents of the legislators.

REV. C. W. SHELTON
Who represented the Yale-Dakota Band

Dr. Merriman believes that the church needs prophets to sound a trumpet call to regeneration within. He feels that we are placing too much dependence upon religious mobs, ebullitions of pious sentimentality. He deprecates the lust for entertainment in our churches, the desire for extravagant music, the multiplication of church kitchens, the use of the stereopticon, the delusion that people want and should have entertainment and mere education rather than doctrine, reproof, correction, instruction in righteousness. He believes that too many of our churches are in danger of giving up a holy and thrilling office and substituting "serving tables and managing peep shows." Philanthropy, he believes, in some directions has been so overworked that it has become flabby and diseased, sentimental and pernicious. We are becoming more concerned with man's body than with his soul and, in the effort to do away with physical suffering, are forgetful that often it is the salutary reward of iniquity. The Old Testament is being subordinated too much to the New and the terror of God, which often is his grace, is ceasing to be proclaimed.

The sermon was virile, provocative of thought and caused discussion even when it failed to win assent on all points, and as a document for circulation by the society will prove to be one of the most valuable ever put at its disposal. As Dr. Merriman has always been considered catholic in his sympathies and liberal in his theology, his conservative views in this sermon will have peculiar weight.

THE SECRETARIES' PAPERS.

The society is fortunate in having three secretaries who can write interesting State papers and deliver them in a clean-cut, impressive way. Secretary Choate's paper on the work of last year indicated the disparity between income and opportunity, and described the exceptionally clamant needs of the work in States both new and old. He believes that in the era on which the society is about entering its work really is to be that of foreign home missions, and he did not fail to note the ominous fact that just as the old era closes and the new one begins the Swett Fund, from which the society for many years has drawn $18,000 a year for its work among foreigners, is exhausted. Were it not that the "hand of the dead" came to the deliverance of the society last year, its debt today

PRESIDENT PENROSE

would be $100,000 and more, and this despite the fact that the regular gifts of the living last year were $6,000 more than during the preceding year, and that special contributions on the General Howard Roll of Honor were $88,500.

Secretary Clark's paper, A Look Backward, packed full of interesting comparisons of the state of affairs, political and spiritual, in 1826 and 1896, had its flashes of humor, as when he described the Plan of Union as "milk from the Congregational cow churned into Presbyterian butter." It was inspiring to listen to the narration of the service rendered by the society's servants in planting civilization on the outposts, in establishing colleges and in saving the West to the Union.

Secretary Kincaird in Looking Forward asserted that the new era will be more distinctively missionary than the first era just closed. "The work that now presses is the illiterate South, the illiterate Southwest, and the illiterate immigrant as he takes possession of our great cities and diffuses his semi-barbaric influence into every portion of our land. Upon this new work we must enter unfettered by traditional prejudices, theories and methods. A facile adaptability to existing conditions is the quality that we need. How can the illiterate masses at the South be most effectively reached? How can the densely crowded foreign quarters of our great cities be penetrated, purified, dispersed, and the emigrant colonies and settlements of the land be elevated and saved? How can the flagellantes and fetich worshipers of New Mexico and the priest-ridden thousands of Utah be rescued from their superstitions and taught a purer and happier faith?"

REPORTS FROM THE FIELD.

Not all of the State superintendents present spoke, but those who did revealed the training that comes from their daily work. A few found the time limit a barrier, but more made it an incentive to terseness and spice. The same may be said of the secretaries of the State auxiliaries, Maine, Massachusetts, New York and New Hampshire having an opportunity this year to describe the conditions which face the workers on the older fields. Conditions are much the same everywhere. Maine has its new territory opening up just as Minnesota has. Michigan and New York see waning settlements and churches just as Massachusetts and New Hampshire do. Indiana has its peculiar problems, because of its Southern and Presbyterian bent. California faces the perils of unwelcome immigrants from China, and Massachusetts equally unwelcome ones from eastern and southern Europe. Everywhere, whether among the Scandinavians of Minnesota, the new American settlers in northern Minnesota, the miners in Idaho or the foreigners in California and Massachusetts, the Congregational polity seems to satisfy latent longings and aspirations. Everywhere the door opens, the people stand ready to hear, and naught is lacking save more money in the treasury so that the work may widen and deepen.

Superintendent Hawkes of Utah reports a most significant contest opening there, in which the contestants are Mormons, and not Gentiles versus Mormons. A revolt against the Mormon hierarchy has begun. The young men, having tasted political liberty, find it sweet, and refuse to go back to servile obedience to the Mormon bishops and elders.

THE RALLY OF THE VETERANS.

A session not soon to be forgotten was the period given over to speeches by men who went to the front, directly from theological seminaries, banded with other men to labor in distinct fields. Rev. Ephraim Adams, D. D., in his seventy-ninth year, but vigorous, clear-toned and juicy, described vividly the formation of the Iowa Band at Andover, its dispersion throughout the State in 1843, and the work which God has done through its members. Rev. Richard Cordley, D. D., aged sixty-seven, read a valuable statement of a similar work done by himself and his fellow-members of the Kansas-Andover Band, which set forth in 1857 to save Kansas for Christ, for the Union and liberty. Rev. C. W. Shelton, now a field superintendent of the society, but the first of the Yale-Dakota Band to set foot on the soil of the Dakotas in 1881, won all hearts by the eloquent way in which he described the motives, methods and successes of that company of young men. And President Penrose of Whitman College, of the Yale-Washington Band of 1890, youngest of the veterans and most enthusiastic of college presidents, made it clear why men who thought to make Spencer's Data of Ethics a subject for discussion found it imperative to grapple with ignorance and evil.

CO-OPERATING SOCIETIES.

The intimate relations that exist between several of our other societies and the Home Missionary Society and their interdependence were admirably explained by the secretaries and some of the superintendents of those societies and by clergymen especially interested. Thus Dr. Cobb of the Church Building Society showed how impossible it was for the Home Missionary Society to do its best work when the Building Society has forty-one applications for new church edifices awaiting a rising of the tide of receipts adequate to supply the demand, and Rev. Wallace Nutting, D. D., now of Providence, R. I., and recently on the Pacific coast, paid his respects to the wealthy Eastern Congregational churches that squander money recklessly on costly edifices when the needs are so great in the far West. Secretary Boynton of the Sunday School and Publishing Society selected Superintendents Rowley of Oregon and Shaw of Georgia to tell in an effective way of the needs of their fields, and to describe how pioneer Sunday school work plants seed that brings forth fruit which the Home Missionary Society garners. Secretary Whittlesey of the Ministerial Relief Fund in a telling way demonstrated that home missionary pastors especially deserve to have assurance that their old age shall not be one of poverty and distress. Secretary Hamilton of the Education Society reviewed the history of that organization and those which it has absorbed, and Rev. William E. Barton of Boston, one of the directors of the Education Society, called attention to the benefits which accrue to the Home Missionary Society if the Education Society is encouraged in its work of providing an educated ministry.

THE BUSINESS SESSION.

The machinery creaked just enough to reveal the fact that it is necessary to have a great machine to do so great a work. The report of the special committee on the report of the executive committee for the last fiscal year was read by Rev. W. W. McLane of New Haven. It pointed out the significant fact that while the contributions to the society have lessened a little in the New England States and New York, they have increased in the Western States; that large spiritual results are the fruit of the gifts of the donors and the labors of the officials; and that last year more money was received, more new men commissioned, more missionaries employed, more places supplied with preaching and more pupils added to the Sunday schools than in any prior year.

The discussion of the time and place of the next meeting was not as thorough or dignified as it should have been, and as a result the action of one session was rescinded at the next, and whereas the society voted Wednesday afternoon to accept the invitation of the Michigan State Missionary Society and go to that State next year, Wednesday evening it withdrew its acceptance of the invitation and placed the responsibility of settling the time and place of the next meeting with the executive committee, which will consider the relative merits of Saratoga and of some Michigan town or city. As the result of Dr. Henry A. Stimson's refusal to serve longer on the executive committee of the society, solely because he believes in rotation in office in that important place, and as a result of speeches made by him and suggestions by Dr. Meredith and others, the executive committee was instructed to consider and perfect a plan and report at the next meeting, whereby each year a certain number of the members of the executive committee must retire and be ineligible for re-election for at least one year.

The only new officers elected were members of the executive committee, the president, vice presidents, recording secretary and auditor and most of the executive committee remaining as the year before. John F. Anderson, Jr., a layman in Dr. Behrends's church, being chosen to serve until 1897, filling a vacancy, and Rev. Dr. Thomas B. McLeod of Brooklyn and Mr. David A. Thompson of Albany, N. Y., together with Rev. Dr. S. H. Virgin of New York city, Rev. Dr. R. R. Meredith of Brooklyn (formerly a member of the executive committee) and Mr. J. W. Rice of Rhode Island to serve from 1896 to 1899.

Dr. Charles H. Richards of Philadelphia, in a strong speech, ably seconded by Dr. Stimson, introduced and carried through a resolution which commits the society to an unflagging prosecution of the effort begun last year to enroll 1,400 names on the General Howard Roll of Honor, and thus wipe out the debt with which the society ended the fiscal year of 1895, 885 pledges of $100 each having thus far been received.

THE WOMAN'S MEETING.

MRS. M. E. SANGSTER.

St. Paul, at a certain period in his life, might have been shocked as he entered this meeting, but he would have left it converted. It was one of the best sessions of a very successful meeting. A more tactful, graceful, businesslike presiding officer than Mrs. Caswell, secretary of the woman's department, cannot be imagined, and her searching questions as to why men are not organized in special bands to study missions and contribute to their support, and whether the separate organizations for women are, or are not, justifiable in view of the drift of events within the church viewed as a whole, made a deep impression and must be answered soon. The prayer by the wife of Secretary Choate was a veritable talk with God. Mrs. Powell of Michigan conducted the responsive service with charming dignity and beauty of interpretation of Scripture. Mrs. Heinzleman, wife of a missionary among the Germans of Indiana, with her naïveté and enthusiasm, made apparent the difficulties and possible victories of work among Lutheran formalists. Miss Caroline O. Potter, secretary of the Christian Endeavor Societies of California, described the methods in vogue there to win young people to Christ and interest in missions, and did it in a winning, satisfying way. Mrs. Moore, one of the original Jubilee Singers, president of the Tennessee Home Missionary Union, sang one of the heart-searching songs born in the heart of a Christian Negro slave. Rev. (Mrs) Dora Read Barber, an evangelist in Oregon, with quaint colloquialisms, revealed somewhat of her own life as a missionary and its peculiar joys and shadows. Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, editor of Harper's Bozar, author, spiritual adviser to thousands who read her pen-product, and friend of all missionary agents and agencies, pleaded for greater loyalty to the cause of missions by the rank and file of women, and set forth four things as necessary to greatest service in the missionary cause: complete and up-to-date information about missions, intenser personal responsibility, enthusiasm, entire personal consecration. Mrs. Barber pronounced the benediction.

AS SEEN FROM THE OUTSIDE.

At all such gatherings it is wise to permit critics from without, men with no official ties, to speak their mind. They have the opportunity to condemn if they will. They seldom find it necessary, and they usually inspire new enthusiasm and give freshness of point of view. This year two Minnesota pastors, formerly and recently in the East, came back to give their impressions of the needs of the field, the spirit of the workmen, and the duty of the churches. Rev. C. H. Patton of Duluth and Rev. D. N. Beach of Minneapolis describe northern Minnesota as peculiarly worthy of aid.

Rev. Dr. A. J. Lyman of Brooklyn is not as pessimistic as Dr. Merriman, but he agrees entirely with Secretary Choate that the menace to the country today is in its foreign immigration, and that the duty of the Home Missionary Society in the new era is to develop foreign home missions. To secure the supreme enthusiasm necessary for the work the supreme example of Christ must be imitated. In no other land can a world's normal school of Christianity be so well established as in the United States.

As sensible a speech as was made, and one that secured as prompt assent from the delegates as any, was Prof. George B. Stevens's address on The Relations of Theological Seminaries to Home Missionary Work. When he stated that one-fifth of Yale's divinity school students have come from Western colleges established as the secondary results of home missionary effort, he revealed one fact that illustrated better than any argument could the relation of the field to the seminary; and, when looking at it from the other standpoint, he declared that seminaries are fast coming to see that they should be fountains not pools, a means to an end, not an end; that a true theology is best inculcated when its students are in vital contact with the work of the church, and are testing their theories by facts; that theology must be teachable, preachable and workable—he hit a truth that his hearers indorsed most heartily.

MEETING OF THE WOMEN'S UNIONS.

The chapel of the United Church was the gathering place on Tuesday for the officers and friends of the Women's Unions, whose field of work embraces the five home societies. Mrs. Kellogg, secretary of the Women's Home Missionary Association, presided at the morning session, which was devoted to business connected with the general organizations and methods of work. Special emphasis was laid upon the training of children in the work, arousing their patriotism being one means to the greater end. Mrs. J. W. Danielson of Providence, R. I., led the afternoon service, which was opened by a suggestive Bible reading prepared by Mrs. C. L. Goodell on Zacchæus. In a paper entitled A Wiser Beneficence Miss A. C. Bridgman showed the necessity of more thoughtful giving, the wastefulness of indiscriminate giving and the obligations upon the denomination of more loyalty to the pledged work of its missionary societies. Miss F. J. Dyer, whose theme was A New Point of View, suggested many ways in which to influence the women in the church to enter the ranks of workers. Indifference to the great missionary causes of the land is a natural result of ignorance concerning them, therefore let information be diffused in all possible ways. Leaders of Current Events Classes, for instance, can with wisdom and tact show how close is the relation between great events in the world and the missionary operations. The Jubilee Year of the A. M. A. was presented by Miss Emerson in a paper reviewing the past fifty years. Mrs. Moore, one of the original Fisk singers, delighted the audience with a pathetic song. Miss Caroline Potter brought the greetings of the California sisterhood and gave some account of the young people's societies on the Pacific coast.

The attack by Dr. Wordin of Bridgeport upon the officials of the society, published over his own signature in one of the local papers, alarmed not a few until it was ascertained that as the result of a recent legal contest the society, and not Dr. Wordin, came into the possession of a bequest made by Dr. Wordin's father.

The cost of one year's crime in the nation would run the Home Missionary Society, at the average cost of its seventy years' existence, for seventeen centuries. It would have kept 2,000 men in the field from the time William was crowned at Westminster, and would support 4,000 men at the front for four centuries to come.—Superintendent Puddefoot.

Apparently the Congregationalists of Buffalo are feeling the necessity of more fellowship, for Dr. Fitch in his speech said that the time has come when the idea of the local church as an individual church should be abandoned, and there should be formations of Congregational unions at least to the extent of regarding the whole city as a unit.

Some of those Mormon teachers that Superintendent Hawkes tells about must be "invincibly ignorant," as, for instance, the son of a Latter Day Saints' bishop, who, when detected in writing "Tripp to the Moon," said that trip was always spelled with two p's when referring to celestial bodies. And their preachers are unrivaled in definition, as, for illustration, the one who said that whenever the word "damnation" was used in the Bible it meant obstruction of the ways of Providence.

An unusual number of our ablest pastors in New England and New York were present, far more than have been seen at recent meetings at Saratoga. Professor Taylor of Andover, Professor Currier of Oberlin and many of the Yale Divinity School faculty were constant in attendance. The representatives of the railroads vised the certificates of not less than 475 people, and the registration of annual and life members of the society was not far from 300, more than at any other previous meeting of the society.

Rev. C. H. Patton of Duluth scored a hit with his story of the woman foreign missionary, who had no compunctions about bedecking herself with Oriental trappings, but did object to giving a missionary talk in a Minnesota theater-church, where she had for a background, not the conventional pulpit and symbolical mural decorations, but stage scenery. And the attempt of the home missionary pastor to provide her with appropriate stage settings was indorsed by all those who believe in æsthetic harmony.

The spirits of John Davenport, James Pierpont, Moses Stuart, Leonard Bacon and the other early pastors of Center Church, whose virtues and deeds are so permanently and modestly recorded on the many memorial tablets on its walls, must have shivered somewhat, at first, as they contemplated the women praying and teaching in their former pulpit, and pronouncing the benediction. But their final verdict, we must venture to hope, accorded with the sentiment of the living, and even St. Paul, if he had been present, would have found it impossible to be other than edified and gratified.

There are some decided advantages in having speeches carefully prepared beforehand and distributed to the great news distributing agencies, and thus at the disposal of the local papers without any great effort on their part. On the other hand, unfortunate complications sometimes result from reliance on this method of reporting a meeting. It compelled Dr. W. E Barton of Shawmut Church, Boston, last week to prepare a new speech on short notice, and it made it necessary for Secretary Hamilton of the Education Society to read a paper which the public had already had an opportunity to read. That is to say, the New Haven papers on the morning of June 4 published addresses by Dr. Barton and Secretary Hamilton, which they were to have given on the afternoon of June 3 and were reported as having given, but which, as a matter of fact, they did not give until the afternoon of June 4.

Not a little of the delight of those who sat in Center Church last week came from quiet contemplation and ever increasing appreciation of the beautiful Trowbridge Memorial window set in the wall over the pulpit and surrounded by a frame of white woodwork entirely in harmony with the architecture of the church and serving admirably as a foil. The gift of Mr. E. Hayes Trowbridge, in memory of his father, Ezekiel Hayes Trowbridge, a descendant of one of the founders of the church, it represents Rev. John Davenport, the first pastor of the church, preaching his first sermon to the settlers of New Haven on the Sabbath of April 19, 1638. Grouped around their pastor are the noble men and women who gave form and strength to the colony. Appropriate symbolism as well as exact and satisfying portraiture, wrought out by the artists of the Tiffany Glass and Decorating Company, have produced a work of art most admirable to contemplate. The example of Mr. Trowbridge and the Center Church in this matter is worthy of general imitation by individuals and churches that trace their history back to the beginnings of New England. Instead of having Jewish and Italian types, let us, in some of our church windows at least, reflect the glories of our Anglo Saxon saints and French and Dutch fathers.

WHAT THE METHODISTS ACCOMPLISHED.

BY REV. F. B. GRAVES.

The session of the General Conference of the Methodist Church held at Cleveland during the past month was one of the most remarkable in recent quadrenniums. Legislation of great importance was enacted, and the atmosphere of the conference was mainly progressive.

The question of the admission of women to the body was solved without as much friction as was expected. This matter goes back to the annual conferences, and if a sufficient vote is received in them, which is more than probable considering the strength their cause exhibited at this session, the women delegates elected in 1900 will be admitted to the body. The idea of the great majority of the delegates at Cleveland was this: We favor the admission of the women, but we wish them to come in by the front, and not by the kitchen, door, and welcomed with a warm, extended hand.

Then the cause of the 265,000 colored members of the church, represented in the body by nearly one-eighth of all the delegates, was greatly advanced. Visiting members of the Methodist Church South were astounded at the large vote which Rev. J. W. E. Bowen, D. D., of Atlanta received for bishop, leading on the first ballot with a vote of 175; and also at the election of Rev. M. C. B. Mason, D. D., of Savannah to a general secretaryship of the Freedman's Aid Society, as collaborator with Rev. J. W. Hamilton, D. D., than whom the colored people have no stancher friend and defender. These are the high water marks to which the tide of progress rose.

The question of equal ministerial and lay representation was referred by a large vote to the annual conferences, where if it receives a three-fourths vote, together with a two-thirds vote of the next General Conference, it will become a law of the church. It is expected, therefore, that 1904 will witness the victory for the laymen, and the settlement of this vexed question. An attempt to introduce laymen into the sessions of the annual conferences failed of passage, though recommended by the same committee.

For two or three sessions the revising of the constitution of the church was earnestly discussed, and then, after adopting part of the suggestions, the conference referred the whole subject to a commission, consisting of six laymen, six ministers and three bishops, instructed to report at the next General Conference in 1900. These last two acts indicate the cautious conservatism of the conference, which, though not as marked as its progressiveness, was nevertheless sufficiently prominent.

The ultra-conservative element came forward in great, almost unexpected, strength when the committee on judiciary reported that paragraph 240 of the Discipline was unconstitutional and ought to be removed or modified. This famous paragraph subjects members of the church who attend the theater, dance, or play cards to ecclesiastical discipline. And yet a distinguished gentleman who has been a correct and consistent (paragraph 240 aside) member of the Methodist Church for many years attended the theater right under the eyes of eighteen bishops and over five hundred choice and selected Methodist ministers and laymen, who refused to change paragraph 240.

In its extreme form the conservative spirit again showed itself when the present method of filling the presiding eldership was under discussion. Its abandonment was eloquently urged by some members of the committee, but the presiding bishops in the several annual conferences will still appoint. In the election of members to the board of control of the Epworth League an important change was made, which puts the General Conference in closer touch with the young people. Hitherto the fourteen General Conference districts have elected the fourteen members of the board of control, to which they are entitled, but in the future they are to be chosen directly by the General Conference. The full significance of this change will not be felt until the next General Conference. The objection, if any, to this new plan lay in the large number to be chosen, which, if politics should enter later, will prove a serious matter, considering how pushed for time the conference is even now. It required sixteen ballots, for example, to elect two bishops.

The time limit for pastors remains unchanged. The uncompromising antagonists of the extension of the pastoral term were the laymen, and yet, if the waning hours of the conference had not been the time when this vital question was considered, the ten-year limit for special cases in cities would probably have been agreed upon. Just on this question the conservative element, led by Rev. T. B. Neeley, D. D., and the progressive party, led by Rev. A. B. Leonard, D. D., were fused by the progressive-conservative element, marshaled by Rev. J. M. Buckley, D. D., who moved to table the matter. Apart from the adoption of the novel church insurance plan, which was reported to have worked to such advantage to the churches in Wisconsin and which was vigorously, almost bitterly, opposed by the laymen, the preceding matters represent the most important legislative work done by this conference.

The sentimental side of the conference was exposed in the retirement of three bishops from effective service—Rev. R. S. Foster, D. D, of Boston, Rev. Thomas Bowman, D. D., of St. Louis, and Rev. William Taylor, D. D., bishop of Africa. The pathos of the act was sweet in its very bitterness. It afforded a gracious object lesson in Christian humility and fraternity. But the labors of these aged and saintly men will be felt for long years in the church for whose vast interests they have self-sacrificingly toiled. Bishop Foster's loss will be sharply felt by Boston and New England Methodism, though he is succeeded by so evangelistic a worker as Bishop Willard F. Mallalieu. The new bishops, Chaplain C. C. McCabe, D. D., and Rev. Earl Cranston, D. D., will prove, the one an interesting speaker on the platform and in the pulpit, and the other a strong man in the administrative functions of the Episcopacy.

It was generally felt that an act of heroism, almost dramatic in its spirit, was performed when Rev. J. C. Hartzell, D. D., a secretary of the Freedman's Aid Society, agreed to accept the position as missionary bishop of Africa, made vacant by the retirement of Bishop Taylor. His election solved other problems than the great ones which will arise in the Congo Free State. Whether Dr. Hartzell will adopt Bishop Taylor's plan and follow with the cross in the track of commerce is not known.

It is perhaps a matter of regret that the election of a missionary bishop for China and Japan was not found feasible, as the door of the island kingdom, so to speak, has been shaken from its hinges by the recent war, thus affording a splendid opportunity for an aggressive Methodism to more fully enter and reap a rich spiritual harvest. But altogether enough was done by the General Conference of 1896 to show that Methodism is still one of the mighty forces at work for the world's evangelization.

Do good constantly, patiently and wisely, and you will never have cause to say that life was not worth living.—George W. Childs.

PASSING COMMENT.

Michigan is taking better care of its needy ministers this year than last.

What an appropriate gift from the Boys' Brigade at that Ohio dedication.

Just what many a young man has been looking for is to be provided in a California town.

That the majority of prizes at Hartford Seminary go to Massachusetts students is noteworthy.

A St. Louis church has hit upon an agreeable and convenient plan for its infant class during the warm months.

That publication in a Massachusetts city which serves our denomination so loyally in its own center is a fine example of what many a group of churches might do in the way of co-operative journalism.

A New Mexico church has distinguished itself by an important step toward the ideal method of Christian giving. If such a movement can succeed on the frontier, what might it not accomplish in more favored localities?

The exterior adornment of our meeting houses is a seasonable suggestion and unquestionably deserves quite as much attention as interior renovations, since something, at least, depends upon bright, neat, external appearances in the question of summer congregations.

The "pull altogether" illustrated in an example of "city work" described below is just the need in many communities which find present scattered energies unavailing. "Team work" among the churches as well as in the church presents the strongest front for aggressive efforts.

SANDUSKY'S INSTITUTIONAL EQUIPMENT.

The First Church, Sandusky, O., was organized in 1819 by two missionaries from Connecticut with six members. Four accessions were received in June, 1820, but no other additions were made for eight years. For six of these years the church consisted of two persons. In 1835 the first meeting house of the city was erected by this church. It was forty by sixty feet in size. In 1855 the house was enlarged. Last summer the corner stone was laid for a third building, and the dedication services began May 31. The building, with the lot, cost $48,500, and is the first modern house of worship in the city. In the basement are a reading-room, library, gymnasium, ladies' parlor, dining-room, kitchen, recreation-room, boiler-room, fresh-air-room, baths, etc. On the main floor is the audience-room, seating 620 people, with the pulpit in one corner and aisles radiating therefrom and seats in circular form. To the right of the pulpit a movable partition separates the Sunday school room, which is itself surrounded by fourteen classrooms. The building is lighted by electricity, and the ceiling of the main audience-room is supported by eight steel arches and surmounted by a beautiful dome in which is an immense skylight. The interior and exterior are very handsome and are perfectly adapted to the uses of an institutional church.

The services of dedication began on the seventy-seventh anniversary of the organization of the church. Sermons were preached by Rev. D. L. Leonard, D. D., and Rev. C. S. Mills, and an address was made by Prof. W. B. Chamberlain on The American Citizen of the Twentieth Century. At this patriotic service the Boys' Brigade presented a national flag to the church.

The pastor of the church, Rev. C. A. Vincent, was installed on Tuesday, June 2, the sermon being by Rev. W. B. Wright, D. D., and the installing prayer by Rev. Albert Bowers. The next evening a good citizenship meeting was held, the principal address being by Rev. H. H. Russell. Thursday evening was young people's night, and Friday evening a reception to the former pastors and the ministers and churches of the city was held, addresses being made by Dr. Ingersoll of St. Paul, who was pastor of the church from 1863 to 1868 and who is still very much loved in the city, and by Rev. R. R. Davies of Meadville. The services were completed, June 7, by communion and admission of members, the sermon in the morning being by Prof. G. F. Wright, D. D., and in the evening by Rev. Edward Ingersoll.

During the present pastorate of two and one-half years the church has greatly prospered. It has made a net gain of over 100 members, nearly all on confession. The C. E. Society has been nearly doubled, and the Sunday school has increased to nearly double its average attendance. On moving into the new building the church has entered upon institutional work, which it has had in contemplation since Mr. Vincent came. By the blessing of God it hopes to make itself useful to the community in many ways, ministering to the whole man.

FIRST CHURCH, SANDUSKY, O.

CITY WORK IN PEORIA.

The First Church, Peoria, Ill., devoted the last Sunday in May to the object of city missions. The pastor, Rev. C. W. Hiatt, spoke on City Evangelization, and reports followed by workers in the several stations. A collection of $1,460 was taken. Plymouth and Union Churches also made special effort for the same cause, raising, respectively, $50 and $300. In the evening a grand rally of Congregationalists was held with the First Church, and addresses were made by prominent speakers from the larger churches on the general topic, Peoria Congregationalism, with the sub-topics: What Do We Stand For? Early Struggles of Congregationalism in Peoria, The German Opportunity, Qualities Needed by Workers in New Fields, and What We Are Doing. There was no gush nor scattering, nor draught upon time, nor wild West sensationalism in any of the speeches, but a close hewing to the line, with the result that a definite purpose of gospel extension in our city is dominant in all the churches.

That there is a population of 10,000 unchurched Germans at our door is a revelation to many and showed the providential leading that has given us a strong German church within the past few months as a base of operations in this great field. Notwithstanding the pressure of hard times, the City Missionary Society begins a new year with brighter prospects than ever before. Its request for $3,000 is already practically met by the churches, many private subscriptions having swelled the pledges of the rally day. The local pastors and laymen now see the wisdom of concentrating their energies simultaneously upon this one object. Conservative business men say that any other appeal than this plain one made by the actual workers in the field would have shrunk the aggregate returns by a thousand dollars. At the union meeting resolutions of sympathy for the stricken churches in St. Louis were unanimously adopted.

The ground is broken and an air of lively interest is manifest on the site of the new edifices of the Plymouth and German Churches. These structures will make a fine showing in the south central part of the city. Under the wise leadership of Rev. S. W. Meek and Rev. H. L. Smidt these enterprises have already become influential, and under better local conditions are prophetic of larger things of the future. The corner stone of the German church will be laid with proper ceremony on the third Sunday in June.

Altogether Congregationalists in Peoria are feeling jubilant over the prospects of good work along all lines. Some of their fields do not promise immediate returns in the shape of churches, as, for instance, the boat work, which is purely a mission of charity to the thousand cabin-boat dwellers, whose life is sodden and immoral in the extreme. Yet this work will not be given up, but most cheerfully carried on in the hope that conditions may ultimately change so that the good seed will not seem to fall before the bills of greedy and filthy wayside fowls. If there were no other result than the intensifying of human sympathy in the hearts of those who toil in this unpromising field, the sacrifice would not be wasted. Already our workers have called attention of the authorities to the condition of these wretched families whose cabin-boats float at the mouth of sewers and whose shanties rest on ash heaps and offal of the river bank, and the indications point to a radical uprooting of the whole sad community and transplanting it to a more wholesome environment. But while this field is unpromising, the other mission stations like Pilgrim Chapel, with its 150 pupils on West Bluff, and Wesley City, with its earnest mining population and the new Washington Street enterprise, all exhibit the good possibility of churches in some early day. Under the labors of two laymen and assistants South Peoria church has done phenomenal work the past year, having to enlarge its quarters to accommodate the crowds. And under the labors of Rev. William Smith the Averyville church is moving steadily forward, a number of conversions being reported from special meetings held a while ago.

The city missionary superintendent, Rev. H. S. Wannamaker, has found two clusters of farmers adjacent to the city who have appealed for church leadership, and the result is the promise of two good self-supporting churches in the near future. So the work goes on and the 1,500 members of our churches in Peoria take courage and bend more willingly to this work on which the Lord has so signally displayed his hand. H.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

MASS.—Hampshire East Conference at its last meeting had as the chief topic Dr. Gordon's The Christ of Today. Sub-topics were considered by various members.

ME.—Hancock Conference met at Green's Landing, Deer Isle, May 27, 28. Sermons were preached by Rev. Messrs. C. E. Harwood and J. P. Cushman. The topics were: Our County Work and Needs, The Work in Our Own Land, The Work Abroad. Rev. J. K. Browne spoke for the foreign field.

MINN.—Minnesota Valley Conference met at Dawson, June 2-5, nearly every church being represented. All the churches but one are supplied with pastors, and nearly all report advance during the year. Rev. J. W. Todd preached the sermon, and papers were read upon Ethical Christianity, Pastoral Work, The Midweek Service, What Constitutes a Good Church, All Around Development, Rural Evangelism. Home Missions and Sunday school work were presented by the State superintendents and the interests of Windom Institute by Prof. C. W. Headley. Devotional meetings were inspiring, and the session was uplifting in spirit.

NEB.—The Elkhorn Valley Association met May 26, 27 at Creighton, Rev G. W. James, pastor, every church being represented. Rev. H. M. Lyman preached the sermon, an earnest plea for more efficiency in soul winning. The reports from the churches on the whole were encouraging, though a number are pastorless. Prof. E. B. Geer read a paper on Church Music; the woman's hour was one of sustained interest, and a full evening was devoted to home and foreign missions. As both Gates and Norfolk Colleges are within the bounds of this association much time and interest were given to the college question, and strong resolutions were adopted pledging continued support to Gates. Four young men were approbated to preach, among them Professor Hinman of Gates College.

CLUBS.

MASS.—At the Cambridge Club last Monday night, held in the Colonial Club house, guests from the Boston, Essex, Newton, Worcester, Fitchburg, Old Colony, North Bristol and Merrimack Valley Clubs were entertained. Short addresses by these representatives were heard on the subject of The Cambridge Semi-centennial. A good attendance was a feature of the success of the meeting.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

Mt. Vernon. Dr. S. E. Herrick preached last Sunday in regard to the Lake Mohonk Peace Conference, reviewing the several questions discussed at that meeting.

There seems to be no falling off in the attendance upon the Boston Ministers' Meeting if last Monday's gathering be considered an index. The main address was by Rev. Elijah Horr, D. D., who considered certain standard theories of inspiration as well as some present day views of the subject. In the discussion which followed Rev Messrs. Terry, C. L. Morgan and C. H. Beale participated. We shall print in a future issue the substance of Dr. Horr's address.

Massachusetts.

NEWTON.—Eliot. A new window has been placed in the house of worship as a memorial to the late Nathan P. Coburn, and dedication services were held last Sunday afternoon. The design beautifully illustrates Dr. Peabody's hymn, "He fell asleep." Through an open portico in the foreground a distant landscape is seen, and the combinations of color are rich and harmonious. The window is a transparent mosaic of glass without stain or paint. Dr. W. H. Davis, the pastor, presided at the services, and Mr. Thomas Weston gave an outline of Mr. Coburn's life and paid glowing tributes to his whole-hearted generosity.

WOBURN.—The Corner Stone, a monthly appearing in the interests of the Congregational churches, the Y. M. C. A. and the W. C. T. U., contains fresh newsy paragraphs about all these organizations, besides helpful articles and editorial comments of special value. In its first few numbers it has launched out on a high plane. Dr. Doremus Scudder is the editor, and his associates are drawn from the various bodies represented.

HAVERHILL.—West. The recent death of Rev. E. W. Allen has brought sorrow to a host of friends, and to none more sincerely than those of this church, where he was the beloved pastor for nine and a half years. As an expression of love and appreciation of the man and his work an impressive memorial service was held on Sunday evening, May 31. Besides acting as pastor he acted as church clerk during his entire pastorate. His records are a monument to his abundant labor and painstaking care.

LOWELL.—Eliot. Rev. H. B. Greene, son of the pastor, has just returned from Palestine, where he has spent the winter making a collection of the Syrian flora.——First. A meeting has been called for next week to see if the church will vote to become incorporated.——A movement for a Sunday school parade similar to that held annually in Brooklyn is meeting with much favor.

WORCESTER.—Central. Rev. E. M. Chapman has returned from a six weeks' trip to England.——Belmont has organized a chapter of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip with 18 members ——Hope has contributed $100 as its foreign missionary offering. It recently gave $25 on the A. B. C. F. M. debt. This is one of the small churches made up entirely of working people ——First Swedish took formal possession of the Salem Street property June 4. Addresses were made by Rev. Drs. Mix, McCullagh, Horr and others. The church was organized in 1880 with 11 members and recognized in 1881. It was then the second church of the kind in the country. It has sent out two churches, one to Fitchburg and the Second Swedish of this city, and has built and entirely paid for a meeting house with some help in building. It has been self-supporting from the start. At present the Swedes constitute about one-tenth of the city's population.——People's refused to accept the resignation of Rev. W. T. Sleeper. Although 77 years of age Mr. Sleeper is far short of the ministerial dead line.

BOYLSTON.—One of the oldest churches in Worcester County is in this place. It was organized 153 years ago, and has erected three church homes. The present one was built 60 years ago. Within two years the pastor, Rev. D. E. Burtner, and his people have accomplished a complete renovation of the house. The old fashioned, uncomfortable, shut-in pews have given place to elegant pews of modern style, the small organ has been replaced by a beautiful two manual pipe organ, new carpets have been laid, the walls and ceiling have been tastefully decorated, the choir quarters have been transferred from the rear gallery to a position near the pulpit and a pastor's study has been comfortably furnished. Rededicatory services were held May 28 in the afternoon. Many former residents and church members were present and also friends from neighboring churches. The pastor, to whom is due chiefly the credit of these changes, gave a historical sketch and announced that the amount required to pay all debts, $2,250, had been raised. Addresses were given by Rev. J. C. Villiers on The Place of a Church Building in the Work of Evangelization and Rev. Israel Ainsworth, a former pastor, on The Value of Personal Consecration. Rev. E. A. Lathrop spoke words of greeting for the neighboring churches.

NORTH BROOKFIELD.—First. A farewell reception was tendered the pastor, Rev. A. J. Dyer, May 25. A large number of friends were present. Mr. and Mrs. Dyer were remembered with valuable gifts, including a gold watch and silverware.

SPENCER.—First. Last Sunday, the third anniversary of Rev. S. W. Brown's pastorate, was marked by a special anniversary sermon. During this period 99 persons have united with the church, 79 on confession. The present membership is 385. The church has contributed over $10,000 for benevolence in this time. One member has gone to China as a missionary and two are now preparing for the ministry.

SPRINGFIELD.—Fourteen young men and women were graduated from the School for Christian Workers this week. Rev. Dr. J. L. Hurlburt preached the Commencement sermon last Tuesday evening.——First. Rev. Horace Sanderson, formerly assistant pastor of this church, occupied the pulpit last Sunday morning. He is now superintendent of missions in Colorado, and his descriptions of the Cripple Creek horrors were vivid and interesting.

NORTH ADAMS.—A handsome monument has been placed over the grave of the late Dr. J. P. Coyle. It is of Westerly, R. I., granite in the form of a cross with flower carving on the front of exquisite workmanship.

Maine.

PORTLAND.—Fourth. Rev. William De Claybrook withdraws from this church after a year's successful work. The church has quadrupled its membership in this time. Mr. W. T. Smythe, a graduate of McGill University, Montreal, succeeds him, and the church which for years has had no legally organized parish will at once become incorporated.——West. Since organization this church has been under control of a self-perpetuating body of trustees. This arrangement has hampered its work and made the enlargement of its edifice financially impossible. It is found that such control is no longer legally valid and that properties bequeathed to the church can be managed and utilized independently of outside control. Plans are on foot for an early enlargement of the meeting house.——State Street. The wearing of a gown by the pastor, Rev. J. L. Jenkins, D. D., at public worship is at present the only instance of this custom in the State. The innovation is favorably received by the great majority of his congregation.——St. Lawrence Street. The church expects to break ground for its new edifice within 30 days. The $25,000 necessary to hold all subscriptions is already practically assured. The untiring enthusiasm and personal effort of the pastor, Rev. A. H. Wright, have accomplished this favorable work.——Williston. The individual communion cups, recently introduced, were the gift of Mrs. G. W. Thurston in memory of her husband, for years the treasurer of the benevolences and a most generous contributor.

BROWNVILLE.—The special meetings held last November resulted in increased spiritual life and activity in all departments of the work, and 16 persons have been added to the membership. The Sunday school has new members and is the largest in the county. The pastor's wife spends much time and effort and the prosperity is due, in large measure, to her efficient leadership. The primary and kindergarten departments and the C. E. and Junior Societies are all flourishing. The women are determined to provide better accommodations and have already the nucleus of a fund for that purpose.

ELLSWORTH.—A prosperous year was reported at the recent annual meeting, with a good state of harmony, and a membership about the same as last year. The Sunday school is vigorous and has given $175 to missionary and charitable objects. The Woman's Society report $200 to benevolence.

CALAIS.—By the will of Mrs. Lucy Wentworth, widow of Hon. G. M. Wentworth of Providence, R. I., bequests are left to several local charities, also to the church of this place $1,000 in memory of her mother, one of the original members, and $500 to the pastor, Rev. C. G. McCully.

BUCKSPORT.—Elm Street. The church has decided to improve its house by thoroughly repairing and refitting with electric lights, stained glass windows, some of which will be memorial, new carpet and new upholstering for the seats. About $2,000 will be expended.

SKOWHEGAN.—Cottage prayer meetings have been much blessed. The freedom from restraint and the personal contact are helpful. A dozen conversions on one street have resulted. A better envelope system promises larger returns for church expenses.

HARRISON.—It is decided to repaint the meeting house and substitute new pews. Four memorial windows will be inserted, two of which are already in place. The C. E. Society will provide for a fifth window.

EASTPORT.—Evangelist Gale and his assistants, who did such good work at Bath, have begun meetings here, in which several denominations unite.

New Hampshire.

LYME.—The celebration, May 22, of the 125th anniversary of the church was a memorable occasion. The service of song and readings, representing the church life of the olden time, was singularly appropriate and instructive. On the previous Sunday the pastor, Rev. C. E. Gordon, gave a historical discourse, bringing out many important facts of interest, and in the evening pleasant reminiscences were given by the older members. The church was organized in 1761 with 22 members, and has since received more than 1,300—600 during the previous pastorate of Rev. Erdix Tenney and 35 the past year. Two of its eight pastors, Rev. William Conant and Rev. Erdix Tenney, served the church 36 years each. Notwithstanding the constant decrease in the population of the town, the church has been remarkably sustained and furnishes a good example of a thrifty and prosperous country church. It has given a few young men to the ministry and several of its young people are at present attending school and college in different parts of the State. It has connected with it one of the best organized and strongest C. E. Societies in the State.

EXETER.—First. The church edifice is nearly 100 years old. The repairs made necessary by its age have been completed and promise another century of possible existence. Hon. J. T. Perry, late editor of The Congregational Record, and his wife, who have lately returned from the tour of the world, were given a pleasant reception, May 27, by the ladies of the church, largely attended and enthusiastic in its congratulations. The church committee and owners of the edifice in the parish, after due consultation with the pastor and leading members, have informally suggested to the officers of the Second Church and parish their conviction of the desirability of the union of the two organizations and their willingness to hold a conference, or conferences, looking to such result. They are now awaiting a reply to their suggestion. Such a union would make one of the strongest churches of the State.

CHESTER.—The church is in a prosperous condition and good work is being done by pastor and people. It has an interesting Mission Circle of young girls, which is full of promise for the future of home and foreign mission fields. The Sunday school is also flourishing, with a membership of 160 or more.

The rebuilding of the parsonage in Lisbon, at a cost of $1,000, places the external appointments of the church in an excellent condition.——A beautiful pulpit Bible was lately presented to the Newport Church by the Gunnison family in memory of a daughter, who died about a year ago. Rev. James Alexander, the new pastor, is giving great satisfaction.

Vermont.

SPRINGFIELD.—A council met, June 1, to consider the advisability of dissolving the pastoral relations existing between Rev. Thomas Bickford and this church. After due deliberation the body approved the dissolution of the pastoral relations, and adopted resolutions commending the brother as a Christian of firm principle and a scholar of ability.

WESTMINSTER.—Hon. Homer Goodhue, lately deceased, left, among other bequests, to the West Church $4,000 and the family residence for a parsonage, and to the A. B. C. F. M. and the C. H. M. S. $5,000 each.

Owing to a settling of the floor of the meeting house in Sheldon thorough repairs are in progress. ——The Barre church has decided to purchase an organ. It will be ready for use in July.

Rhode Island.

PROVIDENCE.—North. The energetic pastor, Rev. F. H. Decker, has been obliged to desist from work a while for health's sake. The weekly pledge system of finance is proving a fine success in this church, which has recently become incorporated. ——Academy Avenue. At every communion service since November new members have been welcomed. Rev. W. E. Smedley has, under discouraging conditions, brought back hope and heart to this church since he began his work as pastor.

EAST PROVIDENCE.—Riverside. Electric lights have been put in and a new piano has been added to the church property by the combined working of Endeavor Society, Sunday school and church. The women have provided for the painting of the parsonage. This church holds a difficult place during the summer on account of the Sunday excursion inroad at Crescent Park in its vicinity. Boats, electric cars and bicycles carry the holiday crowd to the doors every Sunday, but the crowds do not attend its services.

NEWPORT.—United. The Junior Endeavor Society, two years old in March, has supported a Bible woman in India this year and sent a box to Hampton Institute. Eight members of the church died within a year whose average age was over 78. A memorial tablet to Rev. Thatcher Thayer, D. D., has been placed in the meeting house.

CROMPTON.—Swedish Free has completed the work on the vestry at an expense of $200, paid for by the Young People's Society. Other repairs, amounting to $125, have been made. Rev. N. O. Olsen has been pastor since February.

CRANSTON.—Howard. The church building has been repaired at an expense of $1,552, including the purchase of an organ and pews. The financial condition is the best for several years. Rev. R. K. Wickett is pastor.

TIVERTON.—Rev. Samuel Rose, pastor here since January, also preaches at Bliss Corners alternate Sunday evenings. Nine persons have joined the Tiverton church from that locality during the year.

RIVERPOINT.—The church debt is so nearly paid that plans are being considered for the enlargement of the vestry to accommodate the increasing Sunday school.

LITTLE COMPTON.—The Endeavor Society of this church once in two weeks holds meetings at the homes of those who are not able to attend church.

SLATERSVILLE.—The Sunday congregations have been increasing since January, when Rev. J. H. Whitaker became pastor.

The year's trial of the systematic giving in Kingston has been an unqualified success.——The Bristol Sunday school has been growing rapidly of late. The chapel has been frescoed at an expense of $750.

Connecticut.

REDDING.—The church has just issued a manual containing a historical sketch, record of officers and members from its organization in 1733 and other matter. There have been 15 pastors and 323 members. The present membership is 105. Rev. C. F. Luther is pastor.

STONINGTON.—Pawcatuck will receive $100 from the Endeavor Society this year toward the music expenses. Rev. E. L. Warren began his pastorate here May 1.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

BUFFALO — Pilgrim. The council which convened May 29 to take action on the resignation of Rev. J. L. Franklin as pastor expressed its appreciation of the personal worth and the able ministrations which have characterized the eight years' pastorate of this brother and remarked its sympathy with the church, which reluctantly accepts the resignation of the pastor.——Plymouth Chapel. The fifth anniversary of this organization was observed May 31. Addresses were given by Dr. F. S. Fitch and others. Rev. A. L. Grein is pastor.

New Jersey.

BOUND BROOK.—The pulpit of this church, vacant for three months, has been filled by the ordination and installation of Mr. J. O. Jones of Yale Divinity School. The new pastor, however, is of riper years and larger experience than most ministers at ordination, having a number of years of devoted Christian service behind him, both under Protestant Episcopal auspices and in Mr. Moody's institution at Northfield. His doctrinal paper before the council, which was thoughtful and well-balanced, confirmed the impression already gained by his auditors that they were to welcome a man in whom experience had preceded theory and loyalty to Christ was the dominant characteristic. Professor Barstow's sermon was admirable.

GLEN RIDGE.—Vesper services on Sunday evenings have been instituted again for the warmer months. The church will not be closed this summer. Mrs. S. J. Bird of the Upper Montclair church, who conducts a successful Bowery mission work in New York, has just addressed the senior King's Daughters Circle.

District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON —Mt. Pleasant. On May 24, after an effective sermon by the pastor, Rev. M. R. Fishburn, the president of the society made a brief address and called for subscriptions towards the new church building. Over $5,300 were pledged at once. This, with previous amounts pledged and paid and the amount which will be realized from the sale of the present church property, will enable the trustees to begin the work as soon as the preliminary business can be accomplished.

THE INTERIOR.

Illinois.

CHICAGO.—Washington Park. A new site for a church building has been secured. Mr. S. A. Kent made a generous offer of a corner lot at a figure $14,000 below the estimated value, which is $30,000. Plans for the new structure are now under way.

Michigan.

OAKWOOD.—The church has met a great loss in the destruction of its house of worship by the late cyclone. It is hopeful, however, but is especially needy.

About $1,100 were spent last year for disabled ministers against $850 the year preceding.

Wisconsin.

EAU CLAIRE.—Second. Rev. H. R. Vaughn, after more than three years of faithful pastoral labor, in the face of peculiar perplexity and discouragement, resigns as a result of overwork. Since his coming the church has received 125 accessions, most of them on confession, its financial condition has steadily improved and the difficulties overcome have strengthened the tender relations between pastor and people. Mr. Vaughn is resting on a farm a few miles out of town, retaining, however, the care of an out-station, formerly included in his charge, and the editorship of Academia, a journal devoted to the interests of several neighboring churches.

MILWAUKEE.—Hanover Street. The Easter market recently held by the women was a fine success and netted nearly $900, most of which is to be paid on the church mortgage. It is decided to continue the sewing schools of the church through the summer, in view of the large attendance and the eager desire of many who come from homes of non-church-attendants. The Boys' Club and drawing classes will be closed for the summer July 1. Rev. S. S. Mathews is pastor.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

ST. LOUIS.—How far Congregationalist families have suffered from the recent cyclone it is at present difficult to tell. Our edifices, when compared with the wrecks of the Lafayette Park (Presbyterian), Mt. Calvary (Episcopal), Church of the Unity, Lafayette Park (M. E. South) and many others, have escaped with little injury.——Compton Hill. This new house was directly in the path of the tornado, but with the exception of a few pieces of slate and a strip of iron molding missing from the roof the building is uninjured. The house of the pastor, Rev. G. C. Adams, D. D., which was also in the line of the storm, escaped with the overthrow of a brick flue.——Swedish. This meeting house stood near Lafayette Park, almost in the midst of the most terrible destruction in the city. Buildings were torn to pieces all around, but it still stands. Windows were blown in, a part of the roof is gone, and walls and ceiling have been drenched with rain. Supt. A. L. Love estimates that $200 will repair the damage. The pastor, Rev. Andrew Johnson, reports that his people, with the exception of the janitor, have not suffered loss.——Covenant (Maplewood). Many buildings were damaged in this vicinity. The new house of worship, however, escaped with the loss of a flue and with a hole blown through the roof.——Immanuel. This frame building lay in the path of the storm. It was badly shaken, but not overturned or destroyed.

First. The pastor, Rev. J. H. George, D. D., preached the baccalaureate sermon at the State University, Columbia, May 31, the first time in the history of the university that a Congregational pastor has been invited to do this service.——Hope. A canvas addition, 15 x 30 feet, has been made to the rear of the building for the accommodation of the infant class during the summer months, there being no suitable room within the edifice.

Iowa.

NASHUA.—This church is prospering under the ministration of Dr. H. C. Scotford. During the last three months 28 new members have united, 21 on confession. A Boys' Brigade has been organized, which turned out in uniform on Memorial Sunday and Decoration Day.

NILES.—This little home missionary church, Rev. Palmer Litts, pastor, on a recent Sunday raised $160 to clear off the debt upon the church building. No aid was received from the C. C. B. S.

MOORLAND.—A cozy little parsonage of five rooms has just been completed, all bills being provided for. Mr. W. D. King is the happy pastor.

Rev. Palmer Litts preaches to two congregations at Stillwater, one within the schoolhouse and the other outside.——Union revival meetings are now in progress at Sioux Rapids, under the direction of Evangelist Hartsough. The services are held in a tent.——The church at Kellogg has been pastorless for several months. Students from Iowa College, Grinnell, supply the pulpit.——The recent ingathering of 24 persons at Alden, Rev. C. N. Lyman, pastor, followed special union meetings conducted by Evangelist Cordner.——Union meetings are in progress at Burlington, under the lead of Evangelist Chapman.

Minnesota.

DAWSON.—Special meetings last winter resulted in conversions. The debt on the parsonage is almost raised and will be paid during the summer. The church has 75 members and six were to unite last Sunday. The pastor preaches at Boyd and at a country district.

MADISON.—The church has a large country membership, some persons living miles away from the village. The retiring pastor, Rev. E. A. Powell, has been preaching at Marietta, where good congregations have been gathered and much interest developed.

GRACEVILLE.—At the out-station, Chokio, stone has been hauled for a chapel, to be erected this summer. It is expected that a little church of a dozen members will be formed when the house is dedicated. No aid will be asked from the C. C. B. S.

BELLVIEW.—A Sunday school has been formed, and there is a spontaneous movement toward a Congregational church. The community is destitute of preaching, and work will be commenced if arrangements can be made to care for it.

The West Dora church, yoked with Pelican Rapids, has decided to do without preaching until its financial state is improved.——The Roman Catholic population in Benson is increasing, but our church holds its own and aims at self-support.——Mr. Charles Maxwell has accepted an invitation to assist Pastor W. J. Conard at Ellsworth.

Nebraska.

OMAHA.—Pilgrim, which has been worshiping for some time in a private house, has purchased a school building, which it will move to a permanent location. It will then be much better equipped for work. Rev. A. W. Ayers, who has just closed work at David City, has received a call to this church, which it is expected that he will accept. Mrs. A. H. Byles has been supplying the pulpit for the last three months.——Hillside. Rev. Jacob Flook, pastor, has been making earnest efforts of late to increase the size of the evening congregations. A large chorus has been organized, printed invitations are sent throughout the neighborhood, and good results are already apparent, the evening attendance having reached 175.

Five young people have lately joined the church at Indianola, Rev. A. S. Houston, pastor, all of whom have been baptized by immersion.

North Dakota.

SANBORN.—Rev. J. R. Beebe was ordained pastor of this church by an ecclesiastical council held May 29. The sermon was given by Rev. C. H. Phillips, Rev. Messrs. E. H. Stickney, W. H. Gimblett, T. W. Thurston and E. S. Shaw assisting in the exercises. Mr. Beebe is a lawyer who has recently entered the ministry and is doing excellent work at Sanborn. The church is united in him and he enters upon his pastorate under favorable circumstances.

Since Rev. W. A. Wilkinson has taken up work at Abercrombie the congregations have increased and indications are hopeful.

GRASS GREEN.

Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown unless it is resting on such a sofa as this.

You cannot imagine the luxury of one of these low-frame seats with pillowed roll at the head, and minus those soul destroying spiral springs which punch your unprotected body from the inside of the average sofa.

The frame is of solid oak, with the new Malachite finish now so much in fashionable demand. It makes a splendid glow of color in the room and is a background for the flowered fabric which the upholsterer has here used.

The base is mounted upon heavy slabs of oak which are castored and move easily over the floor. The legs are short and handsomely turned. The boxed portion of the frame is richly carved.

It is a sofa that no one can see without stopping to admire.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

PILGRIM HALL, CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, JUNE 5.

Mrs. E. T. Luce presided and read Rom. 1: 8-12, with some other selections referring to the imparting of spiritual gifts and to the stewardship of all Christian disciples, speaking of "the opportunities of vacation time," when foreign mission work, instead of being ignored or passed over in silence, may be promoted by the voice of the stranger in the summer resort. "Ready to distribute," applies to information and helpful suggestion and even the "cradle roll" may be the gainer by the thoughtful hint of the summer visitor.

Miss Case of Osaka, Japan, was reported by her mother, who said: "The account of this meeting is the first thing I read in The Congregationalist." Mrs. Judson Smith spoke of the far-reaching power of the meeting and the link which it is between the missionaries and the workers at home, as well as between the different boards, and introduced Miss Cornelia Judson of Matsuyama, Japan. She related incidents in her own experience in Japan, showing the superstition of the people, the unsatisfactory dependence upon a false religion and the fact that many Japanese girls desire an education, even to the extent of remarkable self-denial in order to secure it.

Mrs. Charles H. Case of Chicago, representing W. B. M. I., was warmly welcomed, and spoke of the problems which confront the two boards and of the sympathy between them in the demands of the work and the difficulty in meeting them, urging the use of home talent in arousing interest with a caution as to taxing the missionaries.

Mrs. Rowland of Tottori expressed her pleasure in the prospect of a speedy return to Japan, and said, "I am sorry for those who must stay here and work, and you need not give us who can go one bit of sympathy, but do pray for us, and please not wait till my name appears in the calendar before you pray for me." An earnest letter from the people of Tottori, urging Mr. and Mrs. Rowland's return, assures them that work enough awaits them in that country. Mrs. J. K. Browne read extracts from a recent letter from Miss Bush of Harpoot, also from Miss Shattuck at Oorfa. Topics connected with the work in Micronesia and the names of missionaries there designated in the calendar were specially mentioned.

Miss Lamson read from a letter just received in connection with a small donation to the Board's treasury: "That empty treasury lies on my heart and it is heavy; it is like the heavy swing and thrashing of the canvas in a calm at sea, to the master of the ship no sound more irritating; better the shriek of the wind in the rigging as with canvas tense and firm she speeds before a squall." After next Friday the meetings will be discontinued for the summer.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

The business situation throughout the country is still depressed, particularly in the large centers west of Chicago. At Denver and some of the minor far Western centers the activity in mining operations makes for considerable trade in general merchandise. This is perhaps one reason why the free silverites in Colorado and elsewhere regard all the talk of depression in the Middle and Eastern States as a trick of the gold men to strengthen their political situation.

It is no trick, however, as the figures of the weekly bank clearings indubitably show. Business is waiting and will wait until the uncertainties of the political outlook are cleared away. Candidate McKinley persists in maintaining his sphinx like silence and the vast business interests of the country suffer accordingly. Moreover, the newspaper utterances from day to day regarding the monetary plank in the St. Louis platform are confusing. One day facts and figures are adduced to prove that sound money must triumph at the Republican convention, only to be followed the next day by other figures that indicate that a straddle on the money question will result.

It is uncertainty that kills, and the present uncertainty is of a most malignant type. Not only general trade, but speculation as well, lies prostrate, and the time of resuscitation is not clearly visible. Some believe that the St. Louis convention will mark the end of the depression, but only if sound money principles triumph. The merchant and financier, on the other hand, tremble lest there shall be a straddle on the currency question at St. Louis. Nothing short of a panic is predicted if silver is recognized in St. Louis, and it is declared that securities will be poor property to own.

We have thus dilated upon the political side of the situation because that is about all there is to the present trade conditions. Crop prospects in the West are excellent, and, barring drought, etc., the country will add materially to its wealth from the products of the soil. The demand for goods has been less in most all lines the past week, and the offerings and request for commercial paper have suffered diminution. Collections also continue unsatisfactory. Iron and steel show a further decline, while wheat went up the past week. The advance in wheat, however, was regarded as speculative.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. WILLIAM ANDERSON MCGINLEY,

Who died in Chula Vista, Cal., May 25, was born Feb. 15, 1831. His family, of Scotch-Irish stock, had occupied the same home in Fairfield, near Gettysburg, Pa., for 150 years. He was admitted to the bar and began practicing in Toledo, O., but gave up the profession to teach in the young University of Iowa, and finally decided to study for the ministry at Oberlin and Andover Theological Seminary, from which he graduated in 1858. Mr. McGinley held pastorates in Shrewsbury, Newburyport and Greenfield, in Gloversville, N. Y., Ross Street Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, Portsmouth, N. H., Emporia, Kan., and Chula Vista, Cal. He was a member of the Christian Commission during the war and was on the field at Antietam and Gettysburg. He was a scholarly man, but possessed winning social qualities, which made him a successful pastor.

ILL tempered babies are not desirable in any home. Insufficient nourishment produces ill temper. Guard against fretful children by feeding nutritious and digestible food. The Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is the most successful of all infant foods.

THE "GREEN" RAGE.—The rage for green as the fashionable color of the present year has reached the furniture manufacturers, and among the interesting pieces of furniture on exhibition at the extensive Paine warerooms on Canal Street there are many pieces with "Malachite finish." This finish, when applied to oak, produces the richest and most beautiful shade of grass green. There is a great demand for such furniture for country houses at the present time.

It is an honest statement and worthy of all belief that interesting meeting at Bryan on account of rain and high water.——Mrs. Shaw has been called to Okarche as a temporary supply.

Montana.

QUIGLEY.—Rev. O. C. Clark of Missoula visited this new mining camp May 20, held a service, the first in the place, and began the organization of a Sunday school. Superintendent Bell spent May 31 there, completing the organization and holding two services. Quigley, though only six weeks old, has several hundred inhabitants. Seventeen saloons are in full blast and the work of the camp goes forward without cessation seven days in the week. The management, however, is in sympathy with religious work and has offered to give lots for a church building. Everything indicates that the camp will be permanent. Congregationalists are first on the ground and could readily hold it were it not for the lack of home missionary funds.

HORSE PLAINS.—This church dedicated a neat house of worship May 27. Rev. F. B. Cherrington of Spokane, Wn., preached the sermon, and Rev. O. C. Clark of Missoula, with Supt. W. S. Bell, assisted in the exercises. The work is in a hopeful condition. Rev. O. C. Clark will supply the pulpit for the present.

New Mexico.

ALBUQUERQUE.—This church has taken important action in deciding to avoid the use of socials and entertainments as a means of raising money for church purposes. The Y. P. S. C. E. first adopted this basis.

DEMING.—The church has been repaired, decorated and carpeted by the Ladies' Aid Society. It is without a pastor, but good work is being done in the various departments.

Arizona.

TUCSON.—Rev. L. A. Pettibone, on account of failing health, has been obliged to resign his pastorate and return to his former home in Burlington, Wis. The necessity of this action is greatly deplored by the church. The pulpit is being supplied by Supt. E. H. Ashmun and President Billman, and services will be continued until July 1.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

WEAVERVILLE.—Rev. H. H. Cole is about to establish a "Young Men's Rendezvous" in this mining town. It is to be a temperance resort on the main street in the center of the town, and will consist of a spa for the sale of temperance drinks, a reading room, game room and gymnasium. After preaching a temperance sermon he formed a league of 107 members and proposed the resort. The plan commended itself and soon $750 were raised.

The fourth Sunday in May was quite generally observed as Children's Day throughout the State. ——Miss Hattie G. Merriam, a student at Oakland Theological Seminary, will spend her vacation speaking in the interests of the W. H. M. U.

Washington.

ROSALIA.—A new house of worship was dedicated May 24, Rev. Jonathan Edwards preaching the sermon. The building and land together cost about $15,000.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

A club has been formed in one society for the study of current events as they bear on missionary matters. Assignments of topics, with references, are given the members by a committee a short time before each monthly meeting.

A Western railroad conductor, who is an Endeavorer, has in his train a rack that he keeps filled with religious reading, which furnishes him an opportunity to do good among the passengers. With a single exception, all those employed on the train are church members. They have formed a quartet, and at some stations where they have to wait they frequently conduct a service.

Dr. and Mrs. Clark have been in Mexico attending the national convention at Zacatecas, besides meetings in Chihuahua and Guadalajara. Dr. Clark has received pressing invitations to visit the country before, but has never been able to do so. Shortly after the Washington convention he will sail for Europe, to be away until the San Francisco convention. After visiting the Continent, he expects to go to India and to South Africa, if possible. Otherwise he will probably revisit Australia. Mrs. Clark will accompany him.

One hundred and fifty delegates from 26 different native societies met in the convention at Askar, about 200 miles from Calcutta. The interest in the meetings was so great that a session five hours long was held. An impressive consecration service was conducted in the open air, with an attendance of more than 700. Banners, mottoes and flowers adorned the chapel where the meetings were held. One society sent a motto worked in flowers, and another sent a cabinet ornamented with Scripture texts. Each member of these societies had some part in the work. Much enthusiasm was awakened by the scores of greetings received from distant points and the responses that were sent.

HARTWELL B. ABBOT.

He was born in Andover, Mass., June 24, 1816, and died suddenly April 14, 1896. His life was spent beneath the ancestral elms of his boyhood home. In 1855 he was married to Miss Sarah A. Jones of Andover, who for nearly forty years helped him make one of the most genuinely hospitable and attractive homes in Andover. He became a member of the Old South Church in 1844, under the pastorate of Rev. John Taylor, and for more than fifty years was one of the chief supporters of worship and Christian work there, being strong in his faith in the vital truths of the gospel. Unquestioning trust, warm and tender friendship, generous hospitality and ready wit were some of his prominent characteristics.

He has been permitted to grow old with his three children, two sisters and a brother, around him.

A loss in all familiar things,
In flower that blooms and bird that sings,
And yet, dear heart, remembering thee,
Am I not richer than of old?
Safe in thy immortality
What change can reach the wealth I hold?
What chance can mar the pearls and gold
Thy love hath left in trust with me?

DROP AND DIPPER PUZZLE

It looks Strange but it is True.

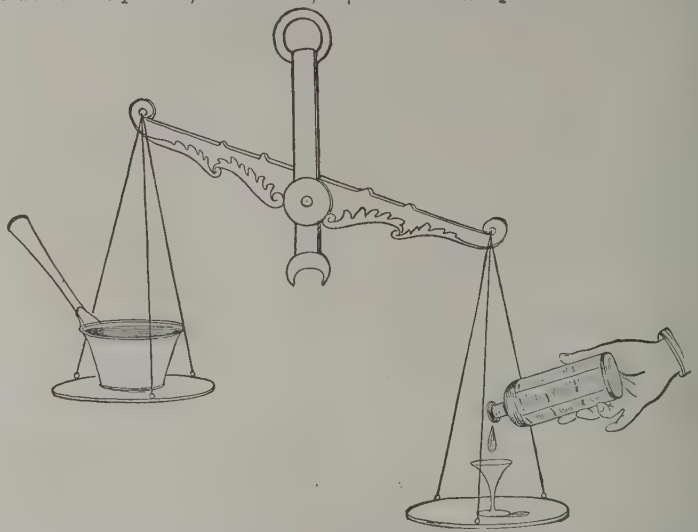
A Case in Every-day Life Where a Single Drop Weighs More Than a Whole Dipperful.

It looks like a puzzle, and it is a puzzle until you try it yourself. That solves it. Every man can solve it. Every woman can solve it. On one side of the scales is a single drop. On the other side is a dipperful. Yet the drop carries the most weight. Why is it, and how is it? Here is the explanation.

The one drop is a drop of Puritana. The dipperful is a dipperful of so-called blood purifier, nerve tonic, or other palate-tickling concoction. The one drop of Puritana is real medicine—it cures. The dipperful is anything, everything, and nothing, when it comes right down to a real cure.



Puritana is the prize formula of Prof. Dixi Crosby, who was for thirty-two years at the head of Dartmouth Medical College. It strikes at the root of 92 per cent. of human suffering, and brings new strength, new health, new life through the power producer of the system. Puritana makes the heart right, lungs right, liver right, blood right, kidneys right, nerves right, and health right, because it makes the stomach right. To any man, woman, or child who will take it as directed, Puritana will practically give a new stomach. That is why hundreds and thousands of people have proved that it cures from head to foot.

J. F. Scott, for years a prominent contractor and builder in Concord, N. H., says:

"I have used Puritana for torpid liver, indigestion, and a species of dyspepsia, and it has given me such relief that I felt made over new. For these troubles I would rather have one bottle of Puritana than a barrel of any other medicine."

She can eat anything now, but her life was hanging in the balance, when her stomach could not digest the simplest food. Mrs. Belle W. Cale, of Charlestown, Mass., tried country air and seven doctors in vain, but Puritana gave her a new stomach and a new lease of life.

Mrs. Henry W. Craigue, of Concord, N. H., was ill for years. She had no appetite, no strength, no ambition. Her life was one constant round of misery and suffering. Puritana gave her an appetite and rugged strength. It made a new woman of her.

No chance, was what the doctor said about George H. Dunning, of Faneuil Hall Market, Boston. He had nervous prostration, had no appetite, could not sleep, could not walk alone. Puritana made him over new from head to foot. It gave him sleep, appetite, and strength.

After trying many doctors, hospitals, and medicines in vain, Mrs. J. S. Daly, of Cambridge, Mass., had also abandoned hope, when Puritana was brought to her relief. It gave her strength and health, pure, rich blood, vigorous digestion, and raised her from the sick bed to the full vigor of happy womanhood.

Yes, one drop of Puritana will bring more real relief, more real cure, more real strength, more real nerve force, more real power and vital energy, more real "life-is-worth-living," than a dipperful, a bucketful, a barrelful of so-called tonics, blood cures, nerve foods, pills, and doubtful preparations from unknown sources, that is the reason why Puritana is the most economical medicine as well as the most effective in the world.

Three Leaders of Organized... Sunday School Work...

KEEPING THE LORD'S DAY.

At the last meeting of the General Association of Massachusetts a pastoral letter was authorized to be sent out in its name to be read in all the churches of the State. Upon it we comment editorially elsewhere in this issue, and below we give extracts:

There are powerful influences at work, with a skill and persistency worthy of a better cause, to pauperize this institution of its divine content. Whatever pleas may be put forward, of a more respectable kind, it is not difficult to perceive that, in the last analysis, they all reduce themselves to these—the liberty of making other men work on the rest day, and the liberty to make money by tempting men to various forms of demoralizing indolence and dissipation.

It ought to be impossible for these influences in society to blind and mislead Christians. Yet it is too true that there is a relaxed moral tone of speech and action among the members of our churches. So subtle is the working of evil in our day that the evil one no longer goes about as a "roaring lion seeking whom he may devour." He comes rather as a cultured gentleman, afraid of bigotry and narrowness; or as an angel of light, interested in liberating mankind from such harassing legislation as the Ten Commandments. One would suppose that even a blind Christian would detect that, though the voice is Jacob's voice, the hands are the hands of Esau. . . .

The literature of the subject should be studied. Care should be taken to put the institution itself on its deepest grounds—those of humanity and morality—and not merely on a foundation of ancient enactment, even that of Moses. When even extreme socialists retain in their program some spark of respect for one commandment of the moral law, and that the fourth, Christian disciples ought not to be increasingly indifferent. Thousands of working men, whose time is not at their own disposal, are mutely, yet tearfully, looking to the churches for help in getting one day in seven for rest. When competition is so keen, and when application in all departments of mental toil is so excessive, the churches should recognize as never before the obligation which rests upon them periodically to lift the mind of man out of its drudgery, and occupy it with new and recuperative thought. Men need rest, but not indolent rest. They need the rest which elevates the mind and purifies the soul; in a word, they need exactly that which the Lord's Day provides for all those who use it intelligently and devoutly.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF INSTRUCTION WILL AGAIN MEET AMID THE INSPIRING MOUNTAINS.—The sixty-sixth annual convention of the American Institute of Instruction, which is to be held at Bethlehem, N. H., July 9, 10, 11 and 13, will offer one of the grandest opportunities for a pleasant and instructive summer outing that the present vacation season is likely to afford. The convention itself will be one of the most important educational gatherings of the year, and it is hard to decide which will outweigh in attractiveness—the program itself or the scenic beauties of the glorious temple of nature in the midst of which the meetings will be held.

As to the former, many of the speakers who will address the convention are specialists of national repute, and they will discuss some of the most pressing problems of the day in education. The morning sessions will be held in Cruft Hall at Bethlehem, and the evening sessions in the cozy Casino at Maplewood. A male quartet, composed of some of the best known singers in the country, will furnish music.

Of the outdoor attractions of famous Bethlehem itself it is hardly necessary to speak. No place in the White Mountain region has more health-giving, invigorating air, more delightful scenery and better hotel and boarding-house accommodations. Besides its own high surrounding hills and glorious vistas, it is within a few hours of the summit of Mount Washington, the Profile, Franconia and Crawford Notch, and the hundred and one other noted features of the mountain region.

No trip could be a more pleasurable one, and the fact that it is made over the Boston & Maine Railroad is a sufficient guarantee that it will be a comfortable one physically. Special rates have been made for the convention by both the railroad and the hotels, and all persons interested in educational matters, whether teachers or others, are eligible to membership in the institute and to participation in these reduced rates.

NOT for a number of years has the observance of Children's Sunday been forced to compete with a driving rainstorm, involving last Sunday, in some cases at least, the postponement of the order of the day. Precedent has certainly led us to expect the brightest of June skies. However, considering the disadvantages incidental to the weather, the various celebrations passed off with marked success, and the extra pains involved in attendance were compensated by the genuine interest displayed. There is no great variation from year to year in the programs, but pastors and teachers, we think, are making greater efforts to emphasize the spiritual lessons of the occasion. As truth is thus made simpler and illustrated more vividly, the older people as well as the children find food and stimulus.

The first tidings from The Congregationalist's pilgrimage came in the form of dispatches published in the evening papers of last Thursday to the effect that Plymouth was reached early in the day and that the American contingent was met by a delegation of ministers headed by the mayor, who went on board and extended a cordial welcome to England, to which salutation a response was made by Dr. Dunning. The voyage was a pleasant one and the Sunday service notable for having the joint participation in it of Bishop Potter of New York and Rev. W. A. Robinson, D. D., of Middletown, N. Y., a member of our party. It is pleasant to observe that thus early in the trip the denominational bars were let down and the real unity which exists between Christians had a chance to manifest itself in so marked a way. We expect to print, next week, a letter describing more fully the voyage.

The persistency with which those interested in securing a better observance of Sunday are carrying on their campaign augurs well for its success. As far as the Congregationalists of Massachusetts are concerned they will all do well to give heed to the pastoral letter just issued in the name of the last General Association, and penned, we understand, by Rev. Reuen Thomas, D. D., of Brookline. We make citations from it elsewhere in this paper, and we would call attention to its keen but reasonable presentation of the subject. The call for more faithful observance of the day is based on humanitarian considerations and supplemented by the testimony of history that the observance of the Sabbath as a divine institution has always brought about a finer civilization and better social conditions. Leaving aside for the moment the controverted points in reference to Sabbath observance, there is a sufficiently large region of action in which sensible people can see harmful tendencies at work and can contribute their own personal assistance to bring about a better state of affairs. We trust this letter will be read in many pulpits. It is interesting to note in this connection the action of the last Episcopal convention of Massachusetts, which has also taken form in a letter to the churches.

The recent sessions of the national representative bodies of the Presbyterian and Methodist Episcopal Churches calls attention to the degree of thoroughness with which, in both denominations, disabled and superannuated ministers are cared for. The disbursements of the Presbyterians, for this purpose, for instance, are seven times as large as the total expenditure of Congregationalism, and those of the Methodists seventeen times as large. Last year the sum at the disposal of our national secretary, Rev. N. H. Whittlesey, D. D., amounted to $2,475, which was distributed among twenty-nine different families or individuals in various States of the Union. It is true that in certain States there are supplementary organizations between which and the national movement the most cordial relation exists; but as the aggregate disbursements of the State and national organizations are less than $24,000 a year, the sum total of our denominational activity in this matter falls far behind the legitimate demand for such aid. Rev. N. H. Whittlesey, whose address is 135 Wall Street, New Haven, Ct., has recently issued a readable and instructive leaflet which points out the good work already accomplished and the duty and privilege of the churches.

We beg to protest against a statement made by our usually cool-headed, as well as warm-hearted, contemporary, The Pilot. It says: "The people of this country are no more than one-fourth of English blood, and of that fourth not one-fiftieth have anything but detestation for our only enemy, Great Britain." There are more than 600,000 Americans in the membership of the Protestant Episcopal Church and we doubt whether half of them, with their English affiliations and traditions of church life, can be said to "detest" Great Britain. The Pilot must revise its figures. And besides this we are glad to think that most Americans are not good at hating.

The Alliance of the Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian System begins its session in Glasgow, Scotland, this week, continuing until June 26. This body, which stands for a world-wide Presbyterianism, meets triennially, the last gathering having been held in Toronto in 1892 and that next previous in London. The basis of representation is for each hundred congregations, or less, two delegates, up to 1,000 congregations, with a lessening proportion in the case of the larger churches. The General Assembly of the American Presbyterian Church, for example, has appointed fifty-one delegates and pays $765 toward the expenses of the meeting. The alliance assumes no authority, but serves as a bond of union between the Reformed churches of the nations. Its meetings have in the past been of special service in affording a basis and opportunity for encouragement and fellowship to the weak churches of France, Austria, Hungary and Italy. The list of delegates from this country is strong and representative and we shall watch the deliberations of the council with interest.

The sea keeps its level because when there is unusual evaporation at any point the water flows in from elsewhere and the lack is made good. A like fluidity in our ministerial supplies would meet many of the troublesome problems of our church life. As the case is we are taking the best material at hand, material from without—from England, from the ranks of other denominations, from the untrained or half-trained candidates whom God has called, to keep our Western churches manned, while men who are fully equipped are lingering without work about our great cities. One of our correspondents in the recent broadside upon the present ministerial distress asks whether it is best to continue supporting our Education Society. Yes, we answer, by all means, yes, but let us make sure that the men who are aided are men who will not stand upon locality in their choice of a field or whimper if the call of God proves to be a call to labor under hard conditions at low pay. Reasons enough there are of health or family conditions to keep older men from going out where need is greatest, but there should be no such reasons operative in the case of those who are at the beginning of their ministerial life. Students who take the aid of the churches should be glad to go where the need of the churches proves to be greatest.

Our Scottish correspondent called attention some little time ago to the disfavor with which a book recently issued by a minister in the Established Church of Scottand and entitled The Saviour in the Newer Light has been received. The critics of the book carried their opposition to the assembly, which met in Edinburgh during the last days of May. There the new teachings were subjected to careful examination and amid considerable excitement, after some vigorous speeches, a resolution was passed declaring that the book contains teaching subversive of, and contrary to, the doctrines of the church as respects the authority of the four gospels, the divinity of Christ, the sacraments, the miracles and the resurrection. On each count there was a large majority against the defendant, about 250 voting against him and only thirty or forty for him. But the assembly went still further and after a discussion lasting until two o'clock in the morning voted, 183 to 144, to suspend him from the ministry one year. The young man who is thus set one side for a season is Mr. Alexander Robinson, minister in a rural parish. This outcome of a case which has caused considerable agitation on the other side of the Atlantic is in significant contrast to the action of the Free Church of Scotland several years ago when Prof. Marcus Dods was handsomely vindicated after being tried for heresy, and in contrast as well to the overwhelming sentiment against the small faction in the Free Church that has been pursuing Professor Drummond for the last year or two. We suspect that the difference is not due so much to a higher degree of orthodoxy in the Established Church as it is to the far wider departure from orthodoxy which the recent book is said to register.

ON ANDOVER HILL.

Relatively few of those interested in the welfare of Andover Seminary were able to attend, last week, the exercises connected with the installation of Professor Churchill into the chair of sacred rhetoric. Those at a distance, however, will be as ready to share in the general feeling of satisfaction in the event. For nearly three years the seminary has been seeking a successor to Professor Pease, and the high ideal aimed at is attested by the effort to obtain such men as Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall and Dr. Henry van Dyke. They declined the honor only after long and careful consideration of it, and their estimation of its worth only enhances its value as it is passed along now to Mr. Churchill.

There are certainly many advantages in laying hold of one already in the corps of teachers. He will not have to lose any time in adjusting himself to local conditions. His work hitherto in the department of elocution has been conducted on so broad a basis that it has led him into the field of homiletics and made him familiar with the demands and opportunities of the chair which he now takes. Indeed, he has been the practical associate of his predecessors in this chair. Though his appointment may not arouse the kind of enthusiasm that might have been drawn out by the choice of a brilliant outsider, it is felt that his thorough adaptation to the Andover harness is a counterbalancing element, and no small expectations are cherished with regard to the quality of his work. Respected alike by the educational fraternity and the citizens of Andover, and possessing a strong personal influence, he is sure to make a record for thorough painstaking and successful discharge of his duties. We expect to see in him personal growth as he assumes larger responsibilities, and we are confident that he will in time bequeath to his successor with undiminished luster the noble reputation which the chair has always sustained.

Theologically Mr. Churchill will be acceptable to the great majority of our Congregational people. The fact that he assented to the creed is not the only guarantee. He did this it is true, and he did not employ qualifying phrases, but made the simple affirmative declaration. At his own request the visitors ruled regarding the way in which the assent should be given, and when they judicially declared that the assent to the creed must legally be without qualifying phrases he accepted their decision, which thus becomes, as we understand it, a precedent. We do not suppose, of course, that he is thereby deprived of a reasonable right of interpretation which every man must possess, if the outcome does not in any way contravene the doctrinal character of the creed as intended by the founders. But over and beyond this outspoken declaration to be faithful to the creed is the well understood, moderately conservative theological position which Mr. Churchill's sermons and other public utterances have made unmistakable.

As respects the prevailing tendencies of thought in Andover, in the various classrooms and among the students, we perceive this year a gratifying trend toward greater positiveness and definiteness. The ministers of the local associations do not hesitate to say that, in this respect, the students who apply for licensure or for ordination are more satisfactory than was frequently the case half a dozen years ago. There is no evidence today of a craving for notoriety on the ground of the liberality of one's belief. On the contrary, while the newer thought is apparent, the object in study seems to be a broad and strong doctrinal basis, standing on which the students shall bring to their fellowmen a positive message of Christian truth. It is significant also that this year's examining committee, composed of twenty men whose ministerial lives range from two to fifty-six years, expressed itself as impressed particularly with the strength of the spiritual life of the institution as exhibited in the course of the examinations.

We do not forget that Prof. George Harris's book, published during the year and entitled Moral Evolution, has seemed to some to concede too much to unevangelical thought. Our Unitarian friends, always in haste to claim in their camp any orthodox man who seeks to restate his faith in modern terms, although protesting against Dr. Harris's argument for the divinity of Christ, which they utterly reject, have not been backward in affirming that he belonged practically with them on many important points. We think, however, that Dr. Harris, even though he has dealt some sturdy blows to hyper-Calvinism, would not admit for a moment that he has departed from the accredited essentials of the evangelical faith. His book ought to be judged in the light of the purpose for which it was written and of the character of that class of the public to which it was chiefly addressed.

As respects the resignation of Prof. Egbert C. Smyth from the presidency of the faculty, its only significance is that one faithful official is given needed rest while another succeeds to the office. After eighteen years of service as president Dr. Smyth chooses to concentrate his strength on his own department, and Prof. George Harris has been appointed his successor.

The festival week at Andover had no occasion more touching and significant than the ordination simultaneously of four members of the Senior Class, who are about to enter upon home missionary work, one of them in the East and three in the West. That they all are moved by the same impulse to give themselves to labor in hard and unattractive fields speaks well for the practical character of the instruction they have received. They thus put themselves in line with those groups from Andover and other seminaries which have gone to similar fields. Andover Seminary can give no more convincing proof of its essential orthodoxy or of its being in substantial accord with its best traditions than by sending out, year after year, men with the gospel in their hearts as well as in their heads and eager to carry the message of salvation to the obscure corners of the earth.

GETTING READY FOR A FIGHT.

The disease of recriminative controversy seems to be sporadic in Congregational circles just now; let us utter our warning before it spreads from the infected quarters. We must expect disagreements, because it is human nature to look at questions from diverse points of view, but the disagreements of Christians ought never to be allowed to reach the acute—that is, the recriminative—stage. If we may be permitted to paraphrase a word of the apostle, we would say, "Brethren, ye are called unto liberty, only use not liberty as an occasion to the temper." Christians are free, but hardly free to fight.

The unfailing advice of the physicians is, "Take a cold in its beginning," and our advice is similar in these church colds which men call quarrels. They spring from carelessness in leaving the mantle of charity at home on flattering but treacherous days, or from overheating of self-will followed by exposure to the drafts of criticism. Once started they are difficult to check, troublesome to the doctors of divinity and the nursing mothers of the churches and perilous to individual growth in grace. A neglected church cold, indeed, too often runs into a galloping consumption whose symptoms are anger, clamor, flaming headlines in the secular newspapers, deficits, mortgages, suits at law; while demons look on and laugh and profane men hug themselves and nudge each other and say, "What a humbug the church is, anyhow!"

When the means of grace are turned into means of quarrel, the children of the church get new and lurid light on the character of pastor, deacons, Sunday school teachers, fathers and mothers. It is a good time to study the "old man," but a discouraging time for the new. It is easy to judge of the possibilities of human nature downward, but the path of those who "follow peace with all men and holiness" is full of flints. We have known men to deliberately prepare the way for a revival, we have never happened to know of church members who deliberately set themselves to prepare for a church quarrel. Judging by analogy and speaking in an ignorance which is subject to correction, we suppose the process would be something like the reading of the service backward in the old witches' "communion of the devil," of which we hear so much in the dark ages.

First of all, it would be necessary to leave the mantle of love at home that the heart may be bare to chilling winds of controversy. Then to get overheated in discussing some matter of disagreement—found if convenient, invented if necessary, magnified always. To sharpen up the critical faculties until they could detect a false note in the choir of heaven, or a ruffled feather in any of the six wings of Isaiah's seraphim, to turn prayers into arraignments, sermons into indictments and exhortations into attacks. Then it would be time to appoint a committee to welcome the reporters (the standing committee will do, it will not be busy welcoming repentant sinners). Then, with a good grip on consistency (interpreted always as consistency with self), there will be little else to do but to exchange Paul's armor [Eph. 6: 11] for Joab's knife and Ehud's dagger and to smite the opposing brethren hip and thigh.

A RARE OPPORTUNITY.

New England will not see this year a religious convention of greater consequence and more vitally related to the welfare of all its churches than the International Sunday school assemblage which convenes in this city next week. Coming, as it does, on the edge of the summer, it may, perhaps, receive less attention than it deserves. There is, therefore, all the more reason why every one who has a particle of interest in or sympathy for the Sunday school cause should be alive to the privileges and opportunities of this great rally.

There may be questioning now and then as to this or that department of Christian activity. A fair argument can be constructed to the effect that organizations are being multiplied at the expense of efficiency and vitality, but the days are long past when any one can cherish misgivings regarding the place and function of the Sunday school. If this right arm of the church is amputated or allowed to become shrunken, the church itself becomes so much the less symmetrical and powerful. Where, on the other hand, the Sunday school is looked upon as a nursery of youthful piety, as a training school for Christian workers, as the little ones' kindergarten and the older people's university, in short, as an essential factor in the church's life, there we are sure to find a healthful spiritual condition and a strong influence exerted upon the outside community.

This international organization, under whose auspices the convention meets, does not exist for its own sake or for the glorifying of any man or set of men. It simply strives to make the wisdom gathered from many sources available to every Sunday school the country over and to federate the great army of teachers and superintendents so that in their individual schools they shall secure a higher grade of service, and shall by virtue of their co operation carry the benefits of the Sunday school to unevangelized men and women everywhere.

We trust that the friends of the Sunday school cause and laborers in its behalf will not fail to reap all the benefit possible from this gathering. Those within easy reach of Boston should sacrifice other things in order to attend at least a few of the services. The sight of so many whose hearts throb with the same enthusiasm, and personal contact with pioneers and veterans, cannot fail to reinvigorate many a despondent worker who has toiled away beset by many disappointments and tempted to give up teaching altogether.

Let there be prayer in all our churches and Sunday schools next Sunday and at many a family altar and in the closet that the convention may be controlled and swayed by the spirit of God and may make a great and enduring impression upon this section of the country.

SEEING GOD IN NATURE.

Those who assert that to worship God in nature is sufficient make a sad mistake, but it also is a mistake not to see beautiful and instructive revelations of him in the natural world. The intelligent student can discover enough in a small bit of ground, for example, to occupy his closest attention a long time and to reveal to him many of the wonders of creation. And the more the range of his observation is enlarged, the greater become the multitude and the impressiveness of his discoveries and the more interesting and impressive their teachings about the great Creator.

Only superficial observers regard nature as commonplace, even in her least novel and alluring aspects. The perfect order of her annual process of development, the variety which enlivens her regularity of progress, the dignity and grandeur of her more comprehensive movements and the delicate finish of her tiniest features, the wondrous beauty of form and color which she illustrates, often where human eyes rarely or never behold it, the lavish, overflowing abundance of her resources all testify to the divine mind as her ordainer and superintendent.

Apparently man is the only created being upon earth who is able to enter appreciatively into God's enjoyment of natural beauty. It may not be safe to say that no bird or animal ever enjoys it at all, but evidently most of them afford little proof of such appreciation, and many seem oblivious of their surroundings. To us, however, it is given to enter in part into the Creator's understanding of nature and to share his delight in its charms. But in order to do this we must regard it from God's point of view. It must be accepted and studied as a true revelation of the divine character and love, even if it be a revelation of only secondary importance.

That our knowledge of it is not complete is a proof of the divine wisdom. This incompleteness is an invitation to further study and a pledge of additional enjoyment. From every point of investigation nature exhibits afresh and continually the wonders of the divine wisdom and power and the even greater wonders of the divine love. At this season of the year especially it attracts our eyes and engages our thoughts. Let no one fail to welcome its appeal to our hearts.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Domestic Politics.

From the many conflicting messages sent from St. Louis by garrulous journalists and politicians to the public during the past weeks one fact seems to emerge, viz., that there is an uprising of the people to defeat the schemes of "bosses" and veteran party managers and Mr. McKinley of Ohio is to be nominated by the Republican convention on the first ballot, if not by acclamation. Just how outspoken the platform's plank on monetary standards will be in favor of the gold standard is not apparent, though at the time of this writing there seems to be no doubt but that it will be far more hostile to silver and far more unequivocal than the party's deliverance in 1892. Compromise is not a popular word save with the delegates from the Central States, the silver faction from the extreme West and the conservative delegates from the South, East and North agreeing in insisting on a clean-cut deliverance. The tariff question has become secondary, and deservedly so. Thanks to the backbone and devotion to principle of the Massachusetts delegation, a concerted attempt of the hotel proprietors to exclude the Afro-American delegates from the St. Louis hotels has failed, the Massachusetts white men letting it be known that if the two representative Afro-American delegates from the State of Sumner and Phillips were boycotted, then the State delegation would cancel its contract with the Southern Hotel and seek quarters elsewhere. As usual Sunday was a day for scheming, committee meetings, the reception of delegates and everything but worship or meditation.

The victory of the sound money faction in the Minnesota Democratic State convention has inspired new hope among conservative Eastern Democrats that the free coinage of silver faction may yet be outgeneraled or suppressed at their party's national convention in Chicago in July, but it is but a faint hope.

The split among the Prohibitionists at their recent national convention in Pittsburg is to be followed by like dissension in the States, apparently. At a meeting of the party's State committee held in Boston last week, eight prominent officials, including the chairman, the vice-chairman and the treasurer of last year's committee, resigned from the committee and declared their intention to organize the faction in this State which at Pittsburg bolted from the convention and organized the National party.

Congress and Sectarian Appropriations.

One of the bones of contention between the House and Senate over which they fought longest was the matter of stopping all appropriations for sectarian institutions in the District of Columbia and for the schools conducted by Roman Catholics on the Indian reservations. The House favored sharp and decisive action and refused to make any such appropriations for the next fiscal year. The Senate, while impressed by the force of the same arguments that had weight in the House, did not deem it just to throw suddenly upon worthy institutions the burden of securing from individuals that support which now comes from the Government, hence it voted in favor of continuing the appropriations for two years more and, at the same time, giving definite warning that they would cease at that time. After frequent conferences between the committees of the two houses a compromise was agreed upon in the following terms:

> And it is hereby declared to be the settled policy of the Government of the United States to make no appropriation of money or property for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding by payment for services, expenses, or otherwise, any church, religious denomination, or religious society, or any institution, society, or undertaking which is wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control; and it is hereby enacted that, from and after June 30, 1897, no money appropriated for charitable purposes shall be paid to any church, or religious denomination, or to any institution or society which is under sectarian or ecclesiastical control.

This is a distinct victory for the A. P. A. forces in and out of Congress, as well as for those who, while disapproving of A. P. A. methods, are as strenuously opposed to sectarian appropriations. It is just to all concerned. It sharply defines the relative functions of church and state and, at the same time, gives fair warning to those most directly concerned that hereafter gifts must be substituted for taxes as the support upon which the sects must lean. Now let the same campaign be carried on in the States!

Municipal Problems and Their Settlement.

Boston is to have a new union passenger station on the south side of the city, in which the trains of railroads now having three distinct termini will enter and depart. This fact has been assured by the passage of the requisite legislation by the State legislature and Governor Wolcott's approval of the same. When the transformation, already begun, has been wrought, it will mean for the majority of those most concerned a saving of time, temper and money, and mark a noteworthy step in the evolution of the newer and greater Boston. It will bring in its train decided changes in the business interests and realty value of certain sections of the city, and will inevitably cause losses to a few at the same time that it benefits the majority. May the edifice to be constructed be beautiful as well as suitable! The Supreme Court's decision that the legislation authorizing the construction of the subway is constitutional removes the last possible barrier from the completion of this great project.

The Boston police commissioners have done their duty in refusing to license saloons in the public parks of the city. The same body of officials also deserves praise for the order issued last Saturday night which, if enforced, will close the many "small ware" stores that hitherto have sold candy, cigars, stationery, newspapers, and "soft liquors" freely on Sunday, and considered it their business harvest day.

The trial of charges preferred by Mayor Strong of New York city against Police Commissioner Parker is now under way, Mayor Strong being judge as well as prosecutor. Whatever the decision is it is sure to be appealed to the courts, cause a long and bitter controversy, not certain by any means to redown to the credit of the reform administration. The incident illustrates perfectly the evils of the bi-partisan theory of administering city affairs—a theory, by the way, which, if a recent decision of the appellate division of New York's judiciary is upheld by the Court of Appeals, will not live much longer in that State at least, for the lower court, passing upon a bill intended to determine the control of affairs in the city of Albany, holds that it is unconstitutional to give to a minority party equal representation with a majority party on any city board. Obviously if this be so all opportunity for cut and dried deals will cease. A municipal reform party now has a chance to reap the fruit of victory and can be encouraged to fight strenuously. Moreover, the court holds that the legislature is having altogether too much to say about local affairs, and the court improves the opportunity to strike a telling blow for home rule and municipal individuality.

Spain and Cuba.

It would be significant if the first intimation that we are to have of Russia's intentions relative to the course of events in Western Europe should be through her intervention in behalf of Spain in her struggle with Cuba. There are some indications that Spain relies upon France and Russia for such aid if, through the failure of her attempt to suppress Cuba or through the acts of her representatives in Cuba, she becomes involved with the United States. The London Times continues to print letters from its correspondent in Cuba confirming all that has been sent to our most reliable journals concerning the complete failure of General Weyler and the deplorable ruin of Cuba's commerce and industries. Our new consul-general, Gen. Fitz Hugh Lee of Virginia, has arrived in Havana, been cordially received by General Weyler and already received proof of Spain's desire to conciliate the United States. His military experience and professional training will make him unusually competent to ascertain the exact state of affairs in Cuba, and his qualities as a man are such that he will not be hoodwinked or cajoled when endeavoring to protect the interests of the United States and its citizens.

A Wholesome Reaction in Germany.

Two recent utterances by typical Germans are pleasant to note. The one indicates that the rulers and people of the South German States are growing restive under the dominance and arrogance of Prussia and her war lord, Emperor William. The other indicates that the more thoughtful men of the empire are feeling that the time has come to protest against the multiplication of laws hedging about the individual and governing every detail of personal and commercial life, which are becoming so numerous that life already is intolerable and personal liberty a memory.

When at a banquet of the Deutsche Verein in Moscow during the recent festivities, the toastmaster, referring to the minor German princes present, alluded to them as "members of the suite of Prince Henry of Prussia, representative of Emperor William," he drew the fire of Prince Ludwig of Bavaria—prospective king of that state, who instantly arose and declared in the most impressive way: "We are not a part of Prince Henry's suite, nor are we vassals of the German Empire. We are the emperor's allies; otherwise, I am an independent representative of Bavaria." Forthwith Prince Henry left the banquet hall in a tiff. The incident has stirred Germany through and through and given the South German press an opportunity to show flames of indignation which have long smoldered.

Not long ago Prince Alexander von Hohenlohe, son of the chancellor, ventured to remonstrate in the imperial Reichstag against the drift of present day legislation and now the minister of finance of the Grand Duchy of Baden has raised his voice in protest against the tendency to "rely on the magical effects of legislation," and has deprecated popular forgetfulness of the law, still regnant, that "Self-action is superior to state protection."

Mr. Chamberlain's Scheme for British Trade Supremacy.

Year by year certain classes in Great Britain have been shifting from unquestioning absolute adherence to the free trade policy which Cobden and Bright induced their contemporaries to accept and consider as final, and even Lord Salisbury himself has not been indifferent to the facts and arguments which can be educed in favor of a return to a modified form of protection. If one wishes to know what there is to be said in favor of this course and how ably it is championed by some Britons, he can do no better than to read Mr. Edward Salmon's article in the June Fortnightly Review. Of course the Liberal party and press are decidedly hostile to any such "betrayal" of the principle for which their party has always fought, and they persist in looking at the question from the standpoint of the British consumer, forgetting the interests of the producer in Great Britain and the colonies. Mr. Chamberlain for some time has held that the British empire, sooner or later, must come to follow the same policy that has made the United States the marvel of the world in rapid accumulation of wealth and a high degree of individual comfort, viz., free trade within the empire and protection against the products of non British lands. Obviously in adopting such an imperial policy Great Britian could scarcely expect the colonies to give all and not receive something. Revenue from tariff duties is too essential a part of the colonial scheme of taxation to be given up for mere sentiment's sake, or because it would benefit England. England, in turn, must grant preferential rates to the products of her colonies if she would bind the empire together in an imperial trading concern. And that is just what Mr. Chamberlain advises her to do, and he reproclaimed his belief last week at a notable session of the Third Congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the British empire, held in London. Mr. Chamberlain, after setting forth the benefits that would flow from such a compromise of differing policies, expressed the opinion that if a proper proposition should come from the colonies, backed by any considerable support, it would not be met with a blank refusal by Great Britain. Debate upon this proposition was thorough and opinion far from unanimous, and though not indorsed unreservedly it received the attention worthy of so great a project, and will be discussed more and more during the coming months by British electors and journalists and their peers in the colonies.

The Wars in Africa.

General Baratieri, the commander of the Italian forces in Abyssinia, has been declared "not guilty" by the court martial appointed to determine his innocence or blameworthiness for the recent failure of the Italian arms in Abyssinia. In response to a question formulated by Lord Rosebery, which could not well be evaded after the revelations of the recently published Italian Green Books, Lord Salisbury, speaking in the House of Lords, has set forth in all its nakedness the purpose of the British Government in its present campaign against the Dervishes of the Soudan. It is not the relief of Italy which Great Britain has at heart. It is the capture ultimately of the Soudan territory, a step held to be necessary for the protection of Egypt. This policy was outlined long ago by General Gordon. If Mr. Gladstone had accepted Gordon's advice he would have saved Gordon's life and his own fair name from a stain that will cling to it, and Great Britain would have been spared much treasure and blood. As it is, the decision to retrace comes at a time which not a few Tories will agree with the Liberals in calling inopportune. British officials in Egypt condemn it, and Egypt's mixed judicial tribunal refuses to give its sanction to Great Britain's scheme to make Egypt foot the bills of the war. Affairs in South Africa are by no means so serene as to justify trying to conquer new territory in North Africa when at any moment hostilities may begin in South Africa, that is, unless a rumor now current in London be true, which rumor says that Great Britain and Germany have come to a perfect understanding as to the future partition of African territory.

Thanks to President Kruger, whose policy of clemency has disarmed his British foes and checkmated Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Chamberlain more effectually than if he had been rigorously just with men who were nothing more nor less than traitors and conspirators, the four ringleaders of the Johannesburg Reform Committee, Messrs. Rhodes, Hammond, the American engineer, and their partners, have been released from prison on the payment of $125,000 each and their signing a pledge to cease interfering with domestic politics. Mr. Rhodes refused to make such a promise and will therefore be banished. When, after this decree had gone forth, a delegation of representative citizens of the Transvaal waited on President Kruger to express their pleasure, he attributed the result to his finding in the Bible those precepts and principles that indicate that it is as well for a State as for an individual to smother hatred by pouring out mercy. There is no use denying the fact that one of the greatest statesmen of this day and generation is "Oom Paul" Kruger.

Turkey and Crete.

It is difficult to see that anything effective is being done by the great Powers to prevent Turkey from repeating in Crete the work she has so effectually done in Armenia. Russia not only is saying, "Hands off from Turkey," but saying to Greece, "Don't you be presumptuous and interfere." Great Britain with her war in North Africa and the demonstrations hostile to her in South Africa is not likely to interfere. However, the whole Eastern question may be opened in a much broader and more vital way soon by an outbreak in the Balkans. Macedonia is seething. Bulgaria is in entire sympathy with the Macedonian malcontents. Austria is by no means willing to see Russia absorb Macedonia or have her confirm Turkey's title to it, and at any time now a spark may be struck that will fire the powder that is lying around loose.

From Miss Clara Barton come letters telling of success in her work and no molestation, showing that the sultan can preserve order and insure protection when he wishes. Rumors of a terrible wasting disease that is consuming the body of the sultan come from Constantinople. Unfortunately for the interests of American citizens in Turkey, Mr. Terrell has insisted upon returning to Constantinople as our minister—sailing last week—and President Cleveland has not thought it best to intervene between Mr. Terrell's ambition and those who are likely to suffer most by it. It is to be hoped that he returns with very definite instructions from our Department of State respecting the principles that he is to assert and the methods he is to employ. If he fails to hold his own with his diplomatic colleagues in Constantinople, brings disaster upon American interests, and is criticised unsparingly in the future, Mr. Terrell will have no one to blame but himself—and Mr. Cleveland.

NOTES.

Ratifications of the Bering Sea treaty, for the settlement of claims of Canadian sealers, have been exchanged.

The sentiment in favor of the free coinage of silver by the United States is more prevalent in the East than many imagine. A recent canvass of the political preferences and financial opinions of its subscribers made by a New England journal specially devoted to agriculture revealed the fact that the free silver opinion is held by many New England farmers; and last week, at a gathering of New England carpenters enrolled in the trades unions of most of the leading towns and cities of New England, a resolution indorsing the free coinage of silver at a sixteen to one ratio and irrespective of the action of foreign Powers was passed with scarcely any opposition.

We commented three weeks ago on the apparent indifference of Woburn officials to a violation of the law by the promoters of a prize fight. We are glad now to chronicle so effective a popular uprising that a contest planned for this week has been set aside. This gratifying result is not due at all to the aldermen, five out of seven of whom seem to have purposely absented themselves from a special meeting at which it was hoped they would initiate repressive action. On the contrary, the outcome is the fruit of popular indignation, manifested at mass meetings and crystallized into a force which could not be resisted. The local pastors of all denominations have borne a brave part in the agitation.

IN BRIEF.

We shall print next week an important contribution from the pen of Dr. Washington Gladden, touching the maintenance of peaceful relations between this country and Europe.

The approach of warm weather does not blight the growth of the Howard Roll of Honor. Almost 900 are registered now, as the record on page 984 shows. And it is not such a very long journey from 900 to 1,400.

It is significant that the proposal for an extension of the Methodist time limit for ministers was defeated by the efforts of the laymen. They evidently feel that the unbroken regularity of pulpit supply more than compensates for the occasional pang of parting from a popular pastor.

Dr. Farnsworth, the veteran missionary, when he sailed from Boston to begin missionary labors in Turkey, sailed on a bark of five hundred tons. When he returned to this country, a few months ago, he came on a steamer that burned as much coal a day as the weight of the vessel on which he set forth for Turkey in 1852.

Here is an interesting and up to date advertisement from—it is hardly necessary to say—a London journal:

Would some pneumatically-minded lover of church work give curate's wife cushion-tired lady's bicycle? For details apply Cycle, 4,973, 346, Strand, W. C.

"Pneumatically-minded" is excellent.

A writer in the home department of one of our religious contemporaries says: "Girls never acquire habits of profanity." It is a tribute to the self-control of the sex that when we asked an estimable lady of our acquaintance whether this broad generalization was true she replied: "Yes, it is true, but we often feel like swearing."

The expected happened at the meeting of the American Congregational Association last Saturday. The action of the committee relating to the purchase of a new site and the sale of the present building was approved and the directors were authorized to appoint a building committee. The final passing of the papers is now appointed for this week Friday.

Charles Kingsley's daughter, the explorer, tells of a trial in a native court which she attended in Africa. "Why can't this man inherit his father's property?" she asked when the verdict was made known. "Because his parents married for love," was the answer. Marriage for any such lofty reason as that was an unpardonable sin in that district of Africa.

The news of a prospective gift of $1,000,000 from John D. Rockefeller for a new recitation hall at Vassar is a sufficiently pleasing piece of information to increase the joys of Commencement, first of all to Vassar itself and then to other institutions that bear in mind the fact that this country possesses many millionaires, and that some of them have a benevolent disposition.

The Defender, the voice of organized Sabbath protectors, hails the Christian Cycle Club as the revolutionizer of Sunday bicycle riding, and prints its pledge:

I promise that I will not use the bicycle on Sundays to attend meets, runs, or races, nor for mere pleasure riding, nor in such a way as to interfere with public quiet, personal rest and divine worship.

The list of members is growing.

Another new departure at Andover! At the meeting of the alumni last week after the obituaries, and interspersed with fervent foreign missionary addresses from eminent men, were two pieces by the quartet. These two were Oft in the Stilly Night and She Sleeps, My Lady Sleeps. It is perhaps worth noticing that many of the graduates did not see the exact application of these songs.

It looks as if the present season would be distinguished above all its predecessors for the number of Americans who will spend their vacation in Europe. In no previous year have so many, and so early in the season, taken passage on Atlantic steamers. Some say this disproves the assertion that the times are hard. The facts may be the other way. It costs less for many an American family to spend a summer abroad than to remain at home in a city house, or to visit a summer resort.

A few generations ago such a calamity as the recent tornadoes in the West would have been received with a superstitious awe which would have paralyzed all effort to help. Today, almost simultaneously with the news of the disaster, come businesslike instructions by which the strong may bear the burdens of the weak. Truly there is cause for rejoicing in these indications that faith is growing more intelligent and the great heart of humanity increasingly sensitive to the woe or weal of brethren, however distant.

Weil, Lesinsky, Zeiger, Strauss, Kretz, Kohler, Wolff, Schilling are the names of some of the most successful prize-winners at Columbia University, New York city, last year. The Jew of the metropolis is maintaining the reputation of the race for intellectual vigor. Recently published statistics concerning the attendance of Protestants, Roman Catholics and Jews at the classical and scientific gymnasia of Germany show that in Prussia, for instance, on a basis of 10,000, the proportion of pupils is 27 Catholics, 50 Protestants and 333 Jews.

It pays to exalt the moral obligation even when the legal obligation is lacking. The Home Missionary Society is likely to receive from the people of Center Church, and other New Haven Congregationalists, adequate and satisfactory recognition in the future of the high sense of honor which the society has shown in transferring recently to the Center Church, for use in maintaining city missionary work in New Haven, a bequest of $5,000, to which the C. H. M. S. had a technical, legal right, but which the donor explicitly set apart for city missionary work in New Haven.

The decision of the probate court in Baltimore in pronouncing invalid the clause of the Stickney will making the C. C. B. S. residuary legatee to the amount of about $300,000 brings disappointment and chagrin to one of our most important societies, the more so because there is no doubt whatever of Mr. Stickney's generous purpose. The bequest was made on the condition that the Building Society should relinquish all claims on Baltimore Congregational churches. The court's decision, therefore, was based on the ground that a conditioned will is not valid, and secondly on the ground that the bequest conflicted with the State law in regard to perpetuities. The case will certainly be appealed, so there is still hope of seeing the testator's wishes carried out.

The glory of the old-time country parish and the old-time ordination to which all the people flocked is often lamented as having utterly passed away. But there was an occasion worthy of the past last week when Mr. MacFadden was ordained and installed over the church in the West Parish of Andover. The council was held at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, the ladies entertained not only the messengers of the churches, but the whole congregation, and at two o'clock the numerous horse sheds were filled with teams from all the country roundabout. Dr. McKenzie preached a thrilling sermon, Professor Smyth made the ordaining prayer, Principal Bancroft charged the new pastor, Rev. F. R. Shipman of the Old South tendered the fellowship of the churches, Rev. F. W. Greene, the former pastor, addressed the church, there was congregational singing of familiar hymns, and all the people said, Amen!

Rev. Dr. William M. Barbour is to be numbered among those wise men who anticipate the approach of age and any possible impairing of their efficiency thereby. Last week he resigned the principalship of the Congregational College in Montreal, which position he assumed in 1887, the resignation to take effect a year from now. We are not surprised to learn that the directors of the institution as well as the students deplore his decision, and bear grateful testimony to the high character of his work and the warm place which he has made for himself in the hearts of all friends of the college. For some time Dr. Barbour has been persuaded that his seventieth birthday ought to mark the termination of his career in so responsible a position. He is as deeply loved on this side the Canadian line as on the other and it will be a long time before he is set one side. The relief from college duties will make him all the more available for various lines of service.

The report of necrology at the Andover Seminary anniversary last week was a striking confirmation of the claim often made for the longevity of ministers. Fifty-six deaths were reported at the average age of a little over seventy-four years. Three of the number had exceeded ninety, twenty others were between eighty and ninety, two only were below fifty. In what other profession, or occupation, or class of men on the earth could there have been such an average as that? Is it not the fulfillment of the Bible promise, "The fear of the Lord prolongeth days"? It was a remarkable year, too, for the passing on of so many sons of Andover who have taken a prominent part in the affairs of the denomination. Among these were Secretaries Clark and Alden of the American Board, and ex-President Magoun of Iowa College. Samuel F. Smith, author of My Country, 'Tis of Thee, and Dr. Arthur Brooks of New York, brother of Phillips Brooks, are also on the list. The thoroughness and discrimination which mark the editing of the necrology reflect great credit upon the painstaking secretary of the alumni, Rev. C. C. Carpenter.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM NEW YORK.

Children's Day.

Brooklyn never tires—nay, she never seems to get quite enough—of her Children's Day. Only those who have an inside experience can ever know, nor would the closest observer of the proud parents thronging to watch the parade even suspect, the work and anxiety—and in the case of many a poor mother the severe self-denial—involved in making ready the outfit for that day of all the year to thousands of boys and girls whose pleasures are few and far between. Every year increases the numbers in the parade and adds new and more attractive features to the brilliant show. This year the main procession in its many divisions, each with its band of music, is said to have numbered 79,000 children, representing 176 Sunday schools. Many of them were reviewed from a stand in Prospect Park by Governor Morton and his staff, the mayor of Brooklyn, and other dignitaries.

In East Brooklyn not less than 20,000 paraded, were reviewed by the mayor and were regaled with good things for body and soul in the nearly fifty churches whose Sunday schools were represented in the procession. The weather could not have been more propitious, people by the hundred-thousand thronged the sidewalks, sometimes drowning the music with their applause, while the stars and stripes floating everywhere from the ranks and from roofs and windows gave the city the brightest gala day appearance.

The Sunday schools of Flatbush, though forming a comparatively small procession (1,300 children), made a beautiful parade, with music and banners, were addressed by their pastor and partook of the usual "goodies." In Jersey City the procession numbered 8,000 scholars and 1,000 teachers.

Sunday School Association.

Another less showy, but most interesting occasion, to lovers of children and Sunday schools, was the forty-first annual convention of the New York State Sunday School Association, held in the Broadway Tabernacle Church, June 3-5. The meeting opened with 200 delegates present and hundreds more came in at the later sessions. Reports were given from all districts of the State and addresses were made by Drs. Schauffler, Behrends, Ostrander, Kittredge, Duncan, Iglehart and many others on practical topics pertaining to the administration and work of Sunday schools.

One session held in the Marble Collegiate Church, Dr. Burrell's, was monopolized by the good women, Mrs. S. W. Clark of this city presiding, with illustrated addresses by Miss B. F. Vella of Boston, Mrs. J. M. Dudley of Elizabeth, N. J., and Miss A. S. Harlow of Philadelphia.

The report from Kings County (Brooklyn, etc.) showed 322 Protestant Sunday schools, 11,746 officers and teachers, 123,992 scholars (minors and adults), average attendance 76,036, contributions $101,697.77, conversions and confirmations 2,908. Scholars in the following Congregational schools: Central, with branch, 2,547; Tompkins Avenue, with branch, 3,384; Pilgrims, with chapel, 1,289; Plymouth, with missions, 1,930; Clinton Avenue, with missions, 1,142.

Dr. McElveen's Removal.

In the council for severing the relations of Rev. William T. McElveen, Ph. D., with the North Church of this city, every Congregational church of the city was represented, and brief addresses were made by eight young men, nearly all pastors of the newer churches in the neighborhood: Rev. Messrs. Bruce, Kellogg, Woolworth, Robertson, Richards, Stokes, Spaulding and Gaylord. Resolutions highly commendatory of the retiring pastor's character and work during the six years since he organized the church, which he has served ever since without home missionary aid, were added by the council to similar testimonials previously voted by the church, the Sunday school and thirteen organizations connected with the church's various activities.

Many generous tokens of loving esteem were received by the pastor from his people in a farewell evening "reception" following the council. Among these was a set of the Century Dictionary, a selection of devotional and exegetical books, furniture for his new study at the New England Church, etc. But the unique feature of the occasion was the starting of the "McElveen Memorial Building Fund," for replacing with a substantial structure the frame building put up five years ago and now altogether too small for the audience. Two hundred dollars were paid on the spot, and $100 more were pledged on condition that it shall be the last donation to complete $1,000 for the building—a pleasant mode of perpetuating their first pastor's memory.

Dr. McElveen opened his new pastorate last Sunday evening with a discourse to the New England children. Dodd, Mead & Co. have lately published a volume of his Sermonettes to Children, the little folks being his special delight.

The New West Side Church.

Another effort is on foot, and claimed by its promoters to be in a fair way this time to a successful realization of the dream of Congregationalists for the last fifty years, to see at least one more church upholding the Pilgrim faith within the limits of the city as it was before the recent additions to its territory. Within the half-century or thereabouts more than twenty efforts to this end have been made, only to come to a speedy end. Undismayed by this history, and encouraged by recent successes in the northern wards, a band of Congregationalists and others friendly to that polity are taking measures to combine in securing a hall at West Eighty-sixth Street and the Boulevard for holding services in the early autumn, with a view to forming a West Side Congregational church. Several of the movers are members of the Broadway Tabernacle. These, with other friends of Dr. H. A. Stimson, are hoping to secure him to lead the movement and become pastor of the church. Thus far, however, they have not his promise to accept the position. The new church, they aver, shall sustain only the friendliest attitude toward the Tabernacle, and shall co-operate with it in extending the Pilgrim faith and polity in the metropolitan district. Let this pledge be carried out in good faith, and many an aged Simeon would depart in peace, his eyes having seen the realization of his heart's long desire.

Greater New York.

Another long step toward the "greater New York" was taken this week in the governor's nomination of the commission for framing the charter under which the consolidated territory is to be unified and governed. Both friends and opposers of the scheme are appointed, and with such men as President Low, Generals Tracey and Woodford, Judge Dillon and Andrew H. Green, with the redoubtable Mayor Pat. Gleason of Long Island City upon the list, the extremes of social life in the metropolis cannot fail of representation. As required by law this commission's work is to be completed by the first of next February, in time to be adopted by the legislature. The "greater" mayor is to be chosen in November to begin his reign on Jan. 1, 1898. Then the city of churches will learn what it is to "become as one of us."

Sunday Wheelers.

The "bicycle craze" is daily growing hereabouts and is making itself specially conspicuous on Sunday. More than 32,000 bicyclers were reported as scouring over the Brooklyn and Coney Island course a couple of Sundays ago. Of these it is not claimed that more than 31,999 were in the bicyclers' church at the island on that day. Dr. Behrends last Sunday spoke his mind as to that use of the Sabbath with rather "scorching" effect, and gave wheelers to understand that he didn't care to see the fashionable bicycle costumes in his pews on the Lord's Day. And his people seemed to be of his mind. HUNTINGTON.

Genuine Loyalty.

The local conferences in Minnesota this spring have been of unusual interest, both in attendance and themes discussed. On all the programs a prominent place was given to our benevolent societies. At the Anoka Conference, including the Twin Cities, denominational loyalty was strongly urged, and the conference recommended a simple league of churches, a Loyalty League, composed of the forty-five churches in the State which gave to all of our societies an offering within the year, the sole condition of membership being a pledge to make an annual offering to each of the six societies. This State league is to be supplemented and strengthened by local leagues in the individual churches. This will involve no new machinery, and certainly will increase the sum total of the offerings in our churches.

At the State University.

The first week in June witnessed the twenty fourth Commencement of the University of Minnesota. The baccalaureate address by President Northrop was on God in American History. The year has been marked by the completion of several large modern buildings and laying the foundations of several others, in order that this rapidly growing university may meet in material equipment the constantly enlarging demands made upon it. In a few years this school has grown from several hundred to an enrollment of 2,500. The department of law, under Dean Pattee's management, in eight years has grown to 370 this year—a phenomenal growth for a professional school. The university is so closely articulated with the public schools of the State that each year will see an enlarged attendance and more thorough equipment and training. Under the leadership of President Northrop the education is Christian in the fullest sense and not in any way in antagonism with the work of denominational colleges.

Carleton's Onmoving Life.

The twenty third annual Commencement of Carleton College was held June 6-10. President Strong gave the baccalaureate sermon Sunday, June 7, on The Sufficiency of God's Grace. In the evening Rev. H. G. Bissell of India delivered a missionary address on A Message from the Field. Carleton has had a prosperous year and the work has been unusually satisfactory. The musical recital and the Class Day exercises were especially enjoyable. The chief feature of the week has been the corner stone exercises of the new Scoville Library. The address was given by Dr. J. K. Hosmer, librarian Minneapolis Public Library. The building is much needed by the college and is to be a model in every particular. The college also needs at once a new science hall, music hall and gymnasium and its patrons may be assured that gifts and bequests for enlarging the plant will justify the wisdom of their beneficence. A Franklin Statue in Lincoln Park.

Saturday afternoon a bronze statue, modeled by Park and cast by the American Bronze Company, was unveiled in Lincoln Park in memory of Franklin. It was the gift of Hon. Joseph Medill, editor of the Tribune. In his presentation speech he said it was his wish, through this gift, to hold up the simple virtues of Franklin to American youth for imitation. The unveiling was done by René Bache, a direct descendant of Franklin. The principal address was by H. J. Estabrook, Esq., a young Chicago lawyer not hitherto prominent as a speaker, but sure to be in demand hereafter. This is the first statue in honor of Franklin set up in the West.

Moody in Chicago.

During the past week Mr. Moody has been on the North Side, at his old home, giving lectures to the students in the Bible Institute and speaking in the Chicago Avenue Church to as many as could crowd into that edifice. He is reported to have said that he has determined to withdraw either wholly or in good part from his work as an evangelist and devote himself to furnishing prisoners, of whom there are 750,000 in the United States, with good literature, chiefly religious. He believes the prisoners will read it because they have nothing else to do, and that they cannot read such literature as he will put into their hands without great good to themselves. This week Mr. Moody has been attending a Sunday school convention in Iowa, and has spoken two or three times at Des Moines. Major Whittle has also been in the city, throwing all his force, as usual, into evangelistic services.

Commencements and Baccalaureates.

Sunday, June 7, Dr. E. P. Goodwin preached to the students of Illinois College at Jacksonville on the parable of the pounds, his subject being stewardship on the ground of equal gifts, in contrast with the parable of the talents where stewardship on the ground of unequal gifts is emphasized. President Blanchard of Wheaton gave the baccalaureate at Knox, where his father was the first president. Dr. Gunsaulus has been at Oberlin, speaking on The New Education before the Kindergarten Department of the college, and on The Present Duties of Scholarship before the Kansas State University at Lawrence. Dr. Withrow has addressed the students of Knox at Galesburg, and been honored by the college with the degree of LL. D.

As his last service in this vicinity, at least for the present, Rev. W. A. Bartlett gave the baccalaureate before the graduating class of Oak Park high school Sunday evening, June 7, and in the afternoon administered the communion to the members of his church, receiving eight into fellowship, among the number the members of an entire family. The same day fifteen were received, six on confession of faith, into the Church of the Redeemer. The many friends of Secretary Herrick of the Education Society will be pleased to know that he has been offered and has accepted the presidency of Washburn College at Topeka. He is a good man for the position and Kansas Congregationalists may be congratulated on securing him as a leader among their forces.

Ministers' Meeting.

This was another Whitman morning. Dr. O. W. Nixon of the Inter Ocean and author of The Life of Marcus Whitman addressed the meeting. He was so eloquent and has such hearty sympathy with his subject that no one felt like interrupting him, though he ran over his time. As the result of the canvass thus far this year, $155,000 have been secured for the college. Both Dr. Nixon and Dr. Pearsons are anxious beyond all expression to secure the remaining $45,000 before Sept. 1. On the ground of patriotism those congregations which have given nothing to the college are to be asked to make some contribution either before or on July 5 or July 12. The contributions which have been made by Michigan and by Oberlin are gratifyingly large.

But the main address of the morning was from Colonel Fielding of the Volunteers, who desired the privilege of telling the ministers just how his movement differs from that of the Salvation Army, of which he was a member for about twelve years and to which he still bears warm affection. According to Colonel Fielding, there has long been a feeling among the higher officers of the army that General Booth failed to take into account the differences between American and English ways, and insisted on making rules for this country which could not be obeyed without friction. The new movement is American. It is also in close sympathy with the churches. While Colonel Fielding said that he himself and many others in the army had endeavored to work so far as possible with the churches, the most strenuous objection to this had come from the general. The Volunteers will put no hindrances in the way of their converts joining the different churches, although like the Salvationists they do not think that a person can serve with the Volunteers and discharge his duties to a church. They will observe the sacraments, although as yet the form and method of baptism have not been decided. They will make more careful provision for the instruction of their workers than Salvationists make or seem to approve. Property will be held by trustees chosen for the purpose, instead of being deeded over to one man as the property of the Salvation Army is now deeded to General Booth. The Volunteers, who have now been organized in Chicago eight weeks, have five posts in the city and thirty-four posts in the Northwest. The meetings are well attended and many conversions have taken place. So far as they can, without neglecting slum work, they will strive to reach a middle class of working men for whom no Christian body is specially working.

A Unique Monument.

A visitor to Oakwoods Cemetery will see near the monument to the Confederate dead, about 6,000 in number, a huge brown marble bowlder, on one of whose polished faces the following inscription has been chiseled:

To those unknown heroic men, once resident in the Southern States, martyrs of human freedom, who at the breaking out of the Civil War refused to be traitors to the Union, who (without moral or material support) stood alone among ruthless enemies, and after unspeakable suffering either died at their post of duty or, abandoning home and possessions, sought refuge and scant bread for their families among strangers at the North. To these pure patriots, who, without bounty, without pay, without pension, without honor, went to their graves without recognition even by their country this stone is raised and inscribed after thirty years of waiting by one of themselves. AN EXILED ABOLITIONIST.

Some of the persons most deeply interested in securing the monument to the Confederates who died here in prison during the war naturally are a little disturbed over this memorial to men who were outlawed in the South. Possibly it might have been as well had the bowlder been put in some other locality, but in all probability the man who paid for it felt, as did many others at the time of the dedication of a monument to the Confederates, that if the Confederates are to be honored those whom they compelled to leave their country or die should not be forgotten, and that the memorial of the one and of the other should stand as they now do near each other.

La Rabida as a Sanitarium.

Many visitors to the World's Fair will recall the rambling structure known as La Rabida. It was erected as an exact copy of the building in which Columbus was lodged for a time, and from whose inmates he received aid in his efforts to sail over the Atlantic. Unwilling to tear it down, the authorities have allowed certain partitions to be removed and such interior arrangements to be made as fit it to be a resting place for sick and tired children. For a long time there has been a sanitarium for children on the North Side, and for one season at least a boat anchored in the harbor was a refuge for the little ones during the heat of summer. The South Side now has a resort of its own, and with every prospect that it will meet an ever growing demand for a place where parents and nurses can take little ones to breathe the lake air and recuperate from the stifling atmosphere of many of their homes.

THE ROMAN FAITH IN ITS HISTORIC HOME.

BY H. A. B.

Inasmuch as religion is the greatest interest of human life, that which appeals most to the ordinary tourist in the renowned cities of Italy is the fact that in them he stands close to one fountain of Christian history and to the thought and life of the earliest Christian centuries. The Protestant tourist cares little for the mere ecclesiastical traditions which rise up to greet him on every hand in the Imperial City. Bits of the true cross, drops of the Saviour's blood, the chains once around the wrists of St. Peter, handkerchiefs and other relics associated with this or that saint arouse a momentary curiosity, but seem of far too little consequence to justify the trouble of sifting the evidence as to their genuineness. It is enough to know that Paul was once here, even though his footprints may be thoroughly obliterated, while all the prestige and power of the Church of Rome, the tokens of its external greatness and the reminders of its former domination over the world carry a certain impressiveness even to the most ardent Protestant or the most confirmed skeptic.

It is hard for the passing traveler to tell whether or not the papacy today is losing its hold upon the Italian multitudes. Such a demonstration as I witnessed in St. Peter's on Easter and on the Sunday evening following, when, after an unusually long period of silence due to the Abyssinian disasters the Te Deum was chanted, would seem to show that still the crowds go up to Christendom's greatest cathedral to worship and to confess their sins after the approved papal fashion. The great Easter convocation had, it is true, a large sprinkling of American and English visitors, whose conduct and conspicuously displayed Baedekers showed them to be of an alien faith, but on the other hand there were hundreds of persons who bowed reverently in prayer and who seemed to be finding in the service satisfaction of their spiritual needs. This was all the more apparent at the service where the Te Deum was sung, when the great congregation took up the responses and a mighty volume of praise from thousands of lips rolled up to the ceiling. When, on rare occasions, the gorgeous Church of Gesu, in the heart of the city, is illuminated by the rays of hundreds of candles, the pressure of the crowds is so great that there is no superfluity of standing room, while every Sunday evening brings to Trinita del Monte an overflowing congregation to hear the Blue Nuns chant their sweet and moving strains, than which in all Rome there is no music more entrancing.

Yet if one should make a circuit with any degree of thoroughness through the 300 or more churches of Rome, he would find not a few where the number of worshipers on week days certainly did not greatly exceed that of the officiating priests. The utter indifference of the clergy to the size of their congregations is noticeable. They have a certain program to perform, so many bows to make, so many bells to ring, so many prayers to mumble, and they do not appear to care whether down in the nave one person is watching them or 1,000. In no particular is the contrast between the American pastor and the Italian priest more marked than in this. The latter never heard of such a thing as the problem of the second service. He is an utter stranger to that feeling of depression which steals over the pastor say about four o'clock on Sunday afternoon when it begins to rain. And as for a series of popular discourses, calculated to draw in the masses, your white robed ministrant of the Eternal Mysteries, as Rome conceives them, is altogether superior to that kind of a drain upon the modern minister's vitality and inventiveness.

Yes, there are some advantages in being a Romish priest, and what wonder is it that their ecclesiastical routine tends to make them corpulent and contented? Still there are many joys which they miss. There are few ministerial clubs among them at which they can read papers on the Advantages of a Water Barrel and Other Institutional Features, and they can never feel that occasional thrill of delight which comes from picking up The Congregationalist and seeing that they have been called to a larger field.

There is a good measure of truth, it seems to me, in one of Mark Twain's discerning observations to the effect that Roman Catholics worship God first, then the Virgin, then St. Peter, then a number of lesser saints, and last of all Christ himself. The kernel of the Christian religion may be there, but it is wrapped about so thoroughly with ceremonial observances of many sorts that there is a wide departure from the simplicity and purity of the early faith. Through all the centuries the hierarchy has played skillfully upon the religious faculties of great masses of men. The priests have catered to the yearning after God, which is part of our birthright. But what a distortion of pure and undefiled religion is the entire network of rites and ceremonies by virtue of which the great majority of the faithful are led to compress their religion into a relatively small fraction of time. They spend a few hours, kneeling or standing, very devoutly, it is true, in some consecrated place, then go their way apparently relieved of all religious duties and obligations, and if they want to lie and cheat they seem, in Italy at least, at perfect liberty so to do. It is true that we Protestants are not above reproach when it comes to comparing profession and conduct, but our ideas, at least, on the subject are correct, and the one thought which is being emphasized today in Protestant pulpits is the permeation of all departments of life with the religious spirit, and this idea is certainly not an outgrowth of the Roman conception of Christianity.

Yet, even with all this by way of criticism, one must acknowledge the service which the Roman Catholic Church has rendered in preserving Christianity, in rearing lofty temples to the praise of Christ, in forcing upon the attention of the world the religion of Jesus in objective forms. There must be in that religion a divine vitality, otherwise, throughout the long years of strife with earthly rulers and of internal dissensions, it would have perished utterly. If Paul came back to Rome today the evidences of Christianity wou'd seem to him quite another thing from the humble assemblies at the homes of the brethren who trudged along the Appian Way to meet him. Yet Paul would be broad enough to recognize any signs of real Christianity, even if they have taken more pretentious forms as the centuries have gone by. Yet the dark Mamertine dungeon, in which calmly and joyously he awaited his doom, is, in its way, quite as impressive as glorious St. Peter's, quite as much of a shrine toward which Christians gladly bend their feet.

For what, after all, explains the persistence of Christianity in the world for 1900 years? Is it not the force of personality behind all forms and institutions? The saintly souls of all ages, some of them of the Roman communion and some not of it, whose faith and hope no prison walls could bound, whose zeal no impending cross could abate—it is they who have preserved the Christian religion and passed it on to us. Some day all branches of the church will understand that in perpetuating the name and influence of Jesus upon the earth, more potent than lofty temples and priestly functions and splendid organizations, are the valor and the sacrifice of men and women for whom to live is Christ

A Second World's Parliament of Religions.

By Rev. John Henry Barrows, D. D.

The echoes of the first parliament had many reverberations in France. Professor George Bonet-Maury, who represented liberal French Protestantism at the Chicago meeting of 1893, held several conferences in Paris and elsewhere after his return. He discovered that a deep and favorable impression had been made on a number of leading minds. Pamphlets, letters and newspaper editorials widened and strengthened this impression. Leading reviews, notably the Revue des Deux Mondes, indisputably the foremost publication of its kind in the world, treated the Parliament of Religions with considerable thoroughness, and the inquiry began to be made: "If this congress proved to be the most important feature of the Columbian Fair why should the Paris Exposition of 1900 want the dignity and significance of another similar assembly?" The meaning of the American parliament was of course variously interpreted, but two facts were plain. The first was this—that men of all faiths had met together in the spirit of love and toleration. The second fact was even more startling. The Roman Catholic Church, the strongest, haughtiest, most conservative and most exclusive of churches, took a leading part in that congress. It was also felt that France was a nation in which a demonstration of the supreme importance of religion might be of uncommon usefulness.

Grave difficulties presented themselves before the minds of those who began to hope. The Catholic Church in America is one thing, the Catholic Church in Europe is another. What would be the attitude of Pope Leo XIII.? Is there Christian spirit enough in France to fill such a parliament with the intensely religious atmosphere which made the Chicago congress at times almost a Pentecost.

Last summer I was invited to confer with the friends of the French congress. Archbishop Ireland had expressed the hope that I would do what I could in commending the plan to the leaders in France. Having only a few days in Paris at that time, I could accomplish but little. I met, however, Prof. M. A. Sabbatier, dean of the Protestant faculty of the university and editor of Le Temps, Zadok Kahn, chief rabbi of France, Professor Bonet-Maury, the Abbé Charbonnel, Father Hyacinthe and some others. In an interview published in Le Gaulois I said that if the chiefs of the Catholic Church in France withheld their co-operation I very much doubted the success of the parliament of 1900, but I called attention to the noble article which appeared that day in the Revue de Paris, written by the Abbé Victor Charbonnel, in which he published Cardinal Gibbons's assurance of the Pope's sympathy with this work of peace and fraternity.

This article of Abbé Charbonnel's was, it now seems, ill-timed. Nearly every one was out of the city the first of last September, and some of the progressive Catholic scholars who had hoped to co-operate in a propaganda for the parliament did not know of Charbonnel's aggressive and powerful plea until the conservative Archbishop of Paris had pronounced vigorously against the plan.

The Revue Bleu published a symposium of opinions called forth by Abbé Charbonnel's ideas, showing a considerable variety of sentiment. The Archbishop of Tours wrote: "I do not think that the holding of the congress in question is possible in Paris. America is not France, neither the people nor the clergy are alike." Archbishop Ireland, however, wrote: "I hope the congress of Paris will take place. It would be a shame if, while the other religions spoke, the Catholic faith were silent." The illustrious statesman, Jules Simon, who has just died, gave it his indorsement, provided the congress kept itself in the domain of human life and avoided theological discussion. Monsignior C. de Harlez, professor in the University of Louvain, a Catholic scholar of conciliatory spirit, heartily favored the scheme as a excellent preparation for sowing the seed of the gospel in non Christian countries.

About this time was published the letter of Pope Leo to Monsignior Satolli, which appeared to show that the Roman pontiff did not favor Catholic participation in a European parliament, although the letter was certainly capable of Archbishop Ireland's interpretation, namely, that Catholics were to be permitted to meet in separate halls in connection with such universal religious congresses. It is well known that the Pope approved the Chicago Congress, of which Cardinal Gibbons said: "It was the happiest event in the whole history of our young church in America."

During the winter of 1896 comparatively little was said and done by the organizing committee, representing Catholics, Protestants and Jews. An invitation, however, was sent to me to visit Paris in April and to hold a conference on the theme Religion and Human Fraternity. I arrived on the sixteenth and within a few days a reception was given me at the home of Col. and Madame Calmard du Genestoux, who are leading Catholics, and the spirit of utmost cordiality was manifested. Among those present I will mention only Frédéric Passy, member of the Institute and president of the French Society of International Arbitration, who had published an important pamphlet on the Chicago congress. On the evening of April 23 my conference was held and was attended by 650 people, specially invited, representing the best life of the university and of the Faubourg St. Germain. Eight abbés and many Protestant pastors were present. The presidency of the conference was given to Anatole Leroy-Beaulieu, member of the Institute, a distinguished Catholic layman, author of Israel Among the Nations and of The Empire of the Czars and Russians. On the platform were Abbé Charbonnel, the Jewish scholar Theodore Reinach, the Greek archimandrite of Paris, Prof. Albert Réville, George Picot, member of the Institute and historian of the States General of France, a Catholic layman of wide influence, Baron de Schickler, perhaps the foremost Protestant of Paris, and other leaders in religion and reform. A Catholic lady, who was a skeptic in regard to the parliament, had expressed the hope that this conference would not be "a rehearsal for the congress of 1900!" It seemed to her, however, when it occurred, to be such, and she was so greatly delighted as to become a convert! The president, in his felicitous speech of introduction, said: "A Greek priest once remarked to me, 'The walls that separate the churches are very high, but, thank God, they are not so high as heaven!'"

In my address I endeavored to show that the age of isolation is passing away, that the bounds of brotherhood are being enlarged and that religion itself is feeling the beneficent change. What had been a disintegrating was becoming a unifying force. Those of us who believe that our Christian faith has rightful claims to universalism are learning that the best propagandism is that which has love, kindness and toleration at the heart of it. A useful congress of religions could not be inspired by indifferentism. The American congress never once dreamed that all religions were equally good. I endeavored to remove any lingering prejudices or misconceptions which might be entertained in regard to the spirit and outcome of the parliament. Somewhat briefly and tentatively I touched upon the Paris congress. But I suggested some conditions necessary to its complete success. It must adapt itself to the aspirations of French society. It must be organized in accordance with rules such as were expressed in the Pope's letter to Satolli; it must concern itself supremely with the applications of religion to the moral and intellectual life of mankind, and it must command in the souls of those who conduct it magnanimity, sincerity and the widest sympathy.

My address was followed by some hearty words from Professor Bonet-Maury, referring to the India lectureship, founded by Mrs. Caroline E. Haskell, and its connection with the Parliament of Religions. A week later I addressed more than a hundred ladies of the Franco-English Guild, and it was felt that both of these conferences strengthened the faith that a universal congress of religions was possible in Paris. At a breakfast, attended by several of the orthodox Protestant pastors of the city, I found a general feeling of sympathy with my hopes. At a banquet at the Palais Royal, attended by large minded representatives of four religions and five nationalities, the sentiments which inspired the Parliament of Religions found utterance in eloquent and touching addresses. When the Catholic layman, Leroy-Beaulieu, of his own accord, offered a toast to the Paris congress of 1900, many present began to cherish a deeper hope that the congress would yet be actualized. At a dinner and reception given later by Madame Siegfried, I answered questions for an hour, mostly in regard to the methods by which such a parliament should be organized and the principles on which it should be conducted. Rev. M. Roberty, the eloquent preacher at the Oratoire, expressed the opinion that there is not religion enough in Paris to make the congress successful. He has written: "We are not worthy of it. In Amsterdam or Geneva what happened in America might be repeated." I saw so much of the nobler side of French life as to make me more hopeful.

All the world will be in Paris in 1900. A parliament could be made so attractive as to draw many thousands of earnest men from Great Britain, America, Switzerland, Germany, Scandinavia, with representatives from all the continents. I am informed that in Holland, the home of Protestantism and of toleration, the journals for days gave full accounts of the Chicago congress, and that in Sweden many thousands of copies of a Swedish translation of the parliament's proceedings were eagerly purchased. There is a good deal of fear of the mockery and skeptical raillery with which a portion of the Paris press is sure to attack a congress in the interests of religion. On the other hand, the better journals of the French capital are known to be favorable. And, although my conferences occurred during a political crisis, such was the general interest in the proposed parliament that many columns of reports were published.

It is probable that the Paris congress must be carried on independently of the French Government, and that the Catholic clergy who are favorable must for a time remain in the background. With patience and much prudence the good cause may be still further forwarded by those who profoundly realize what grave interests of humanity may be promoted by a universal congress of the faiths. What an object lesson it might be in fraternity and religious tolerance! What a long step toward the unification of Christendom.

Is the Paris whose streets were once red with the blood of St. Bartholomew to give the world its noblest spectacle of spiritual brotherliness? Is the great, new hall of the University of France, decorated by the genius of Puvis de Chavannes, which has been offered for the parliament of 1900, to signalize the change that has come over human thought since the Sorbonne was linked with theological rancors and persecutions? Is the France of St. Louis and Joan of Arc, of Calvin and Bossuet, of Fénelon and Madame Guyon, of Pascal and Lacordaire, of Montalembert, Guizot and Pasteur, spiritually strong enough to inaugurate in Euro e a new epoch in religious history? Time will tell. But the present hopeful temper of the best religious minds in Paris is itself a chief marvel of these closing days of the century.

WASHINGTON AS THE SEASON WANES.

BY LILLIAN CAMP WHITTLESEY.

During a recent session here of the Woman's Home and Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Church, South, it received an invitation to a tea at the residence of the Chinese minister. He and Mrs. Yang, in rich Eastern robes, received the ladies and listened attentively to a short address through an interpreter by the president of the society. In his reply the minister stated that there was no opposition on the part of the emperor of China or of the educated upper classes to the presence in that country of Christian missionaries; the antipathy known to exist is confined to the lower classes exclusively. Permission was asked of the minister to present a Bible to Mrs. Yang; he granted it, saying in English, "I thank you very much." Refreshments were served, and the minister seemed very much pleased to find that a young woman missionary could converse in his own language. I think that this is the first instance of a social function extended to a missionary society by a foreign legation at the capital.

At the request of the Korean minister, seven of his subjects have found shelter for the past few weeks in one of the dormitories at Howard University. These young men, gentlemen's sons, were sent to Japan to be educated. Not liking their surroundings, they ran away and shipped for Vancouver. Their case was reported to the minister here, who provided them transportation across the country and a temporary stopping place at the university. The question is now what next to do with them. They are very anxious to stay. Several ladies in the families of the faculty are kindly teaching them English. The young men, who are from eighteen to twenty years of age, are bright, polite and eager to learn. One hundred dollars a year would pay all the expenses of one of these youths for a year at the university.

In these two instances we have the heathen coming to our shores and crossing our thresholds, and the representative doorway of a most conservative Oriental nation literally thrown open to Christianity. An interesting feature of the Commencement exercises at Howard University this year was the dedication of the Andrew Rankin Memorial Chapel. It is tastefully constructed of red brick and is an addition to the group of buildings, balancing the new home of the president on the other side of the university proper. But far beyond the outward pleasing effect is the advantage to the students of the fine audience-room upon the main floor and the library accommodations in the basement. It is admirable for most of the Commencement exercises and for lectures, concerts and Sunday services.

During the struggle before the committee of Congress for the usual appropriation, much emphasis was laid upon the unsectarian character of the institution. In view of this, President Rankin was asked who was responsible for the design of the beautiful memorial window above the platform. It is in three panels, the central and largest representing the landing of the Pilgrims, and those upon either side a street in Leyden and the manor house at Scrooby. The whole is a memorial to the late Mr. Henry Stickney of Baltimore. Any one might be content to be responsible for a window so rich and suggestive in design, and when the president admitted that he had had something to do with it, he added, "but the Pilgrims were not sectarian, they belong to us all." Evidently the German Catholic firm who were to work out the design thought so too, for their first sketch showed the landing pilgrim in gown and cassock, with a crucifix in his hand.

The theological department draws no aid from the Government, but is supported by the A. M. A. At its twenty-third Commencement, held in the chapel, eight young men were graduated. In his annual statement Dean Ewell spoke of the necessary curtailment of the appropriation by the A. M. A. and the resulting pecuniary trials. He showed how far-reaching a charity it would be to endow a second chair in the seminary, and to what use smaller gifts to students could be put. Appreciative mention was also made of the late Miss Mary F. Andrews of Milbury, Mass, a steadfast friend of this department. Its undenominational character is shown by the fact that this year there have been four denominations represented in the faculty and eight amongst the students. While the instruction is not denominational, it is strictly evangelical. The report of the examining committee, made up of ten clergymen, was very commendatory. One of these gentlemen went so far as to say that the examination was "fully as good as those listened to at Yale and Union Seminaries and in some respects superior."

Many of the professors in this and other institutions, and most of the city pastors, will stay in town till after the Christian Endeavor Convention. Careful and extensive preparations are being made by an able and hard-working committee. Delegates will have no fear but that the accommodations will be ample. Everything possible will be done for their comfort. If cool weather prevails, all conditions will seem to conspire for a grand and uplifting convocation. The chorus of 4,000 voices has been drilling in sections, and will sing together for the first and only time at the base of the monument, Saturday, July 11. Three great tents will be pitched in the White Lot, and twenty churches will also be thrown open for services. A thousand uniformed ushers will be on duty day and night to receive incoming parties, escort them to their destinations, and, later, about the city. Maps, flags and guide books have been sent out as freely as public documents. In the parks the colors and outlines of the floral welcome are beginning to show. One of the street car companies is working diligently to have its rapid transit service ready before the convention. Sixty thousand bicycles belong here and many establishments are laying in an extra stock of wheels for the Endeavorers. Desirable excursions are planned for the days following the convention. The Hampton School and places made historic by the battles of the Civil War will have a great interest to eager Northern and Western eyes, while the ocean, the caverns of Luray and the Natural Bridge are easily reached.

One of the most interesting places in Virginia is Monticello, the home of Jefferson. The National Geographic Society went to it and to the University of Virginia for their summer outing not long ago. The fine old manor house rivals in situation and completeness Mt. Vernon and Arlington combined. It occupies the level top of a low truncated mountain, and from every side are beautiful views of hills and distant mountain ranges. The grand old trees, the extensive servants' quarters, and the proportions and design of the mansion itself give one a new idea of Jeffersonian simplicity. The master of that establishment made a personal sacrifice when he left the service of his 300 slaves and the hospitalities dispensed at Monticello for a three days' journey to Washington—a trip that we made in three hours.

Art is badly trammeled when tied to politics. We have had a signal instance in the criticisms upon the beautiful Marquette statue sent by Wisconsin for statuary hall. For fear of the A. P. A. no formal speeches of presentation were made. In submitting a design for the last panel in the historical frieze in the rotunda of the Capitol the chairman of the committee is met with objections. It is desired to represent the opening of the Columbian Exposition, but this introduces President Cleveland into the fresco, and there are some Republicans, and Democrats as well, who do not desire that.

The wedding of the Vice-President's eldest daughter and Rev. Martin Hardin of Kentucky closed the social season here. The Vice-President and Mrs. Stevenson, with their daughters, are held in high esteem, and their experiences of sorrow and of joy have been shared by a large circle of friends. The marriage day was the tenth anniversary of that of the President, and he and Mrs. Cleveland received as many congratulations at the reception as did the bride and groom. Mrs. Cleveland seems more beautiful and gracious than ever, and continues to win all hearts. She and the children have gone to Grey Gables. Mrs. Stevenson also left a few days after the wedding, and the President's official family are scattering in various directions for the summer. One of the Cabinet, Postmaster General Wilson, is named among the speakers at the Christian Endeavor Convention.

Today the Capitol looked as though the storm center of politics was moving to St. Louis. There was a quorum in the House, but the ranks are thinning. The "Cherokee Strip," as the section where the Republicans lap over onto the Democratic side is facetiously called, was almost deserted. The Speaker was perfectly cool during a breezy debate about accepting the Senate amendments to the Sundry Civil Bill. Mr. Cannon of Illinois, who had the bill in hand, was pretty stubborn and said some very plain things about the Senate. Going from there to the Senate chamber the first words that fell upon the ear were, "A bill for the condemnation of useless and worn-out cannon." It was a relief to learn that it was nothing personal to the member from Illinois, only a part of the naval appropriation over which they were killing time. Senator Teller was walking about with his hands in his pockets, probably jingling silver. The fiery and voluble senator from South Carolina had departed, and there was the general air that prevails in a schoolroom just before dismissal.

HIS HIGH CONNECTIONS.

BY REV. A. H. QUINT, D. D.

It is fresh in mind that as a result of recent disturbances in the Transvaal several persons received sentence of death for acknowledged treasonable practices. Of course, it is seldom that political offenses, although treasonable (unless it be those of Irishmen), are now expected to receive severe punishment, and the sentences referred to have been commuted. But before this almost immediate suspension of sentence could be heard of, a request was hastily signed by most of our national senators and representatives, asking Transvaal clemency for the American who was unfortunate enough to be included in the list of the condemned. This petition, drawn by a senator, gave two reasons for clemency, one his previous good character, the other "his high connections." The latter phrase was used twice. Evidently it was considered by the senator who prepared the paper as a powerful argument.

In such a semi-official action is such a consideration really in good taste? Is it in accord with the American principle in our intercourse with other nations? Is it free from the danger that the government to which it was addressed would be led to suppose that a man who did not have "high connections" would not have excited so much interest among the members of our great legislative body?

I do not believe that, in the haste of signing, anybody but the mover noticed this particular expression. But it is unpleasantly suggestive. And yet I do not believe that in official action, and in careful scrutiny of any proposed resolve, either branch would allow any expression which would suggest anything derogatory to the equality of American citizenship. I am thoroughly sure that the executive branch of our Government looks only to the rights of American citizens as such, and their needs when in trouble, simply because they are citizens. The poorest and loneliest man is entitled to just the same protection under that flag which so many thousands of poor men fought and died to uphold as men who have "high connections." This is the American idea, this is the idea which our Government has always honorably maintained. To the honor of our judiciary I can positively assert my conviction, after observing the work of our New England courts for a goodly number of years, that our judges are never swerved from their duty by any considerations of poverty on the one hand or of high connections on the other. Indeed, if there is any bending I think it is toward the ignorant and friendless.

Within a week I saw a repetition of what connects itself with the theory of discrimination, namely, that the government exists to promote the greatest good of the greatest number. How such a wicked theory could have been suggested in a land which holds to equal rights it is hard to conceive. We have no privileged classes who are to be favored at the expense of others. Government exists to promote the greatest good of the whole number. It ought not to subtract from the good of a minority to add what is thus taken to the good of others. The fact that that minority is evidently needy is the reason why it should not be abandoned in promoting the prosperity of the greatest number. The sentence which I have quoted is the rule of majorities run into oppression. It tramples upon the needs of the needy, the appeal of the helpless. Nor can there be any greater fallacy than to suppose that the greatest good of the greatest number can really be promoted except by those things which promote the good of all. The moment that discrimination comes in, so that measures are adopted theoretically calculated to help classes and ignore the suffering remnant, that moment there will be a poison in the measures themselves. If the government should exert its influence discriminatingly for men of high connections, the government would begin to lose its hold. Government knows only citizens. It helps everybody if it is to help anybody. Unless it is adapted to help everybody it is essentially a partial failure.

I have written so far frankly to express political views. But I would not have done it except that underneath the whole is the Christian idea. It is the idea of the church in the world. It is the idea of the gospel in the heart of the church. There are no different gospels for different classes. There is no gospel good for anybody unless it is a gospel which by its divine and essential nature is good for everybody. There is no gospel for the educated and another for the uneducated. There is no gospel for wealth and another gospel for poverty. There is no gospel for one social standing and another for another social standing. There is no metaphysical gospel for one class and a plain gospel for another. Underneath all distinctions of class, education and philosophies must be the one simple gospel. If any supposed gospel is not adapted to the wants of every man it is not a true gospel.

Why not? Because all men alike are sinners. This is the fundamental assumption of the Christian gospel. All men need to repent of sin and turn to God. Jesus Christ our divine Lord suffered for the sins of the whole world, bearing their sins in his own body. To be born again of the Holy Ghost is the universal necessity. Men may, of course, disbelieve in these statements, but I am stating what is essential and absolute in the New Testament gospel. Where then are distinctions within the gospel possible? There is a common need. There are times when heart speaks to heart out from groups in society to those in other groups. Times when the common experience of trouble finds a common Lord; a common experience of spiritual need finds a common Saviour. A gospel which is not adapted to all persons is not a genuine gospel.

In one of the great New York churches, perhaps fifteen years ago, I heard the most honored preacher of that city. In the home to which I was invited for dinner I expressed some surprise at the simplicity and directness of the sermon which I had heard and I asked how such simple gospel sermons kept the house full of the class of people who were evidently present. "We have, indeed," answered the lady, "a great number of wealthy people. But we are plain people, after all, who know that we need the simple gospel and nothing else would satisfy us." She was right. A gospel for that avenue could do no good in that avenue if it was not the gospel for the poorest streets of that city. Crowds may be drawn in some localities by brilliant unbelief. I am writing now only of what kind of gospel is to make earnest Christians, spiritual churches and successful workers, wherever those Christians worship, wherever those churches are established and wherever faithful people work.

Some years ago, in the church of Notre Dame, Montreal, a genial priest showed some of us the rich vestments there in use. By and by he showed his greatest treasure. It was a rich cloth, most lavishly and expensively embroidered with gold. "There," said the kind-hearted old man, with his eyes glistening, "is the pall which is placed over the coffins of poor people. For many years I begged the money for this, and now the poorest man can have as fine a funeral as the richest." There was something touching in the old man's words. Maybe he remembered that as all men are equal in death, so Christ died for all men alike.

The Christian Advocate reckons the cost of the Methodist General Conference to the churches outside the city where it meets at less than four cents per member—and considers it cheap at the price. On the other hand the Michigan Christian Advocate calls it "a stupendous machine," and adds:

It comes and goes like clock work. It convenes by peremptory orders, is opened under disciplinary mandate, runs its course like a threshing machine, and turns out its results about like a grist mill. A great deal that is put into its hopper comes out in shorts and bran. Its fine flour of legislation is always limited. . . . A smaller general conference would be more serviceable. The church could run it, and not it run the church. Debate would be easier, clearer and stronger. Less time would be wasted in parliamentary blundering and maneuvering. The voice of real public sentiment would be just as likely to be heard, and urgent reforms would be quite as likely of adoption.

THE BEE AND THE ROSE.

There is a constant joy that I have found
On upland pastures in the light of noon,
Far from a human face or human sound,
That I could tell, were I a golden bee
Like this one who goes booming toward the sea,
Making the most of summer, gone so soon,
And passing on life's way melodiously.

There is an ecstasy that I have known
Among the shadows of green arching things
That I could breathe, if I had only grown
In fragrant beauty like this brier rose,
Which lowly lives and wholly unpraised blows,
Cheering the bright air where the robin sings,
And only this one simple duty knows!

It is nothing unusual for an indulgent mother to shield the delinquencies of a child from the father but does she realize the lasting harm that may result from this course of action? Nothing is gained in the end by a policy of concealment. The child will unconsciously learn to equivocate, to deceive, to get the best of a bargain by artful misrepresentations. The father, whenever he discovers these attempts to keep matters from his knowledge, will be even more resolute and severe in punishment. Yet these same mothers would resent the imputation that they are responsible for any lack of dutifulness toward the father or for the moral obliquity of the children. A common form of this maternal weakness is to supply boys and girls who are away at school or college with spending money without the father's knowledge, an act which fosters a spendthrift habit and thus increases the evils already mentioned.

"The space between is the way thither." This is one of the hardest facts in life to learn. The mercenary and pessimistic spirits of our time have done so much to make us believe that a "pull" is the only means to success that we are always looking for short cuts. When it comes to character building, however, the "space between" must be traversed to gain the end—a well-developed soul. It is so hard, so revolting to our faith in ourselves, to find that we cannot become truly strong till we have borne chafing burdens, that to gain patience we must be tried and, in many cases, be found wanting before we have learned to wait hopefully, that to be true must cost us a searching of motives, all this is a humiliating revelation. It is so ignominious to be forced to admit that we have the same seeds of jealousy and uncharitableness in our hearts which we abhor in others. But until we have learned this from sad experience we are not free to overcome our evil with good. We must begin just where we are.

THE WOMAN'S POWER.

Two new books have just come from the press, Swinburne's The Story of Balen and Stevenson's Weir of Hermiston. So alike in their witchery of expression and their power to reveal the possibilities of the English language, whether used in verse or prose, it is interesting to find them dedicating their books to women, concrete personalities that have touched and transformed them.

Listen to Swinburne as he says to his mother:

Love that holds life and death in fee,
Deep as the clear unsounded sea
And sweet as life or death can be,
Lays here my hope, my heart and me,
Before you, silent, in a song.
Since the old wild tale, made new, found grace,
When half sung through, before your face,
It needs must live a springtide space,
While April suns grow strong.

And Stevenson as he says to his comrade, his censor, his spur, his wife:

I saw rain falling and the rainbow drawn
On Lammermuir. Hearkening I heard again
In my precipitous city beaten bells
Winnow the keen sea wind. And here afar,
Intent on my own race and place, I wrote.
Take thou the writing: thine it is. For who Burnished the sword, blew on the drowsy coal,
Held still the target higher, chary of praise
And prodigal of counsel—who but thou?
So now, in the end, if this the least be good,
If any deed be done, if any fire
Burn in the imperfect page, the praise be thine.

HIGHER EDUCATION AMONG WAGE-EARNING WOMEN.

BY HARRIETTE KNIGHT SMITH.

Amid the multiplication of woman's organizations, developed mainly by her larger place in industry, there are some significant elements which remain almost unemphasized, chief among which is the great work woman herself is accomplishing for her higher intellectual life. This impulse first expressed itself in America, during the early days of the Lowell cotton factories, in which the daughters of New England farmers worked for half of the year in order to support themselves at schools like Bradford Academy or Ipswich Seminary, or to help earn the college expenses of their brothers at Yale, Williams, Dartmouth or Harvard.

For the first twenty years the Lowell factories might have been classed as a select industrial school for the higher grade of New England's young people. The girls there were just such young women as today are knocking at the doors of Smith, Wellesley and Vassar Colleges. They went to Lowell to labor with their hands, but this did not hinder the employment also of their minds, as their overflowing mental activities manifested. These young women who toiled together cleared away the first weeds which concealed the path of independent labor for other women, and by their association as factory operatives practically said that in America no real odium should ever be attached to any toil that an honest, self-respecting woman may undertake. Girls had never before tried this organized experiment, but they found it evolved in them a dormant strength of character as well as of intellect. The societies for mutual improvement which they organized, the magazines they edited, the poems and essays they wrote were but the beginnings of this line of work throughout the land.

Without reference to their wealth or social standing all women are today placed in one of two ranks—women who do something and women who do nothing. Society leaders have not wrought this condition of affairs, but the working girls have led others in their higher valuation of an all around education and to their influence can also be traced the establishment of colleges distinctively for women. For a half-century Boston has been the nerve center of this movement, largely through the influence of Lucy Larcom, herself a Lowell factory girl. In this city there was organized several years ago, in one of the most aristocratic of the Back Bay churches, a society among its young women called The Friendly Workers' Club, whose object was to bring into a closer acquaintance and mutual helpfulness the rich young women and the wage-earners of its membership. For years this has been maintained in a cordial spirit, the society girls acknowledging that the actual contact which the business girls held with the dollar-and-cent world has been the source of great gain to them. Regular courses of study have been maintained by this organization, while such subjects as Banks and Banking, Strikes, and various other phases of political economics, have been carefully discussed.

At this point I am brought to describe the helpful work which has been accomplished in this and other Boston organizations by one who has persistently sought to conceal herself behind the cause in which she delights. A graduate of Ipswich Academy and a pupil there of Lucy Larcom's, her association with this form of education is logical and is but the evolution of the Lowell idea. For fifteen years thousands of readers of The Congregationalist have been familiar with the initials "F. J. D.," and occasionally have seen the full name of Frances J. Dyer, who was the founder, under Mr. Richardson's management, twelve years ago of its Home Department, and whose unostentatious but important work has weekly enriched multitudes of homes. Yielding to the desire of representative persons and of her young students also, The Congregationalist's editors have accorded me the privilege of putting into words an outline of what she is doing for wage earning women.

Seven years ago Miss Dyer became a member of Berkeley Temple (an institutional Boston church) and an impulse to be of actual service led her to see that few of the self-supporting women of this congregation had time for a daily perusal of the newspapers. Realizing that her editorial reading could be turned into profit for these women, she organized a class in their interests. In the beginning the meetings took the simple form of familiar talks on What and How to Read. Later, as they increased in numbers and interest, the more definite name of Newspaper Class was adopted; this became the Current Events Class, and in 1894 the Current Events Club was organized. During the last seasons, in addition to current history, considerable time has been devoted to the study of Tennyson (The Princess, Idyls and In Memoriam), beside several evenings to Mrs. Browning, Lowell and Wordsworth, together with regular courses of general history. The organization began with an attendance varying from fifteen to forty, which steadily increased until last winter it numbered eighty and occasionally over a hundred. During the five winters of its existence an attendance of 4,272 is officially recorded.

As the Berkeley Temple young ladies gave enthusiastic accounts of their meetings, other young women were eager to come under Miss Dyer's instruction, and this desire led to the establishment of two more current events and history classes for working women—one in the Friendly Club (before mentioned) and the other in the Congregational House—so during the past season she has devoted her Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings to these classes. In a note written to Miss Dyer by one of these women is this sentence: "I feel that I owe you much, since in so many ways you have taught me how to teach myself," which is an exact definition of the sort of instruction which she imparts. Another thus words her appreciation of benefits received:

With eyes half shut and ears that heard but dully,
With just a strip of sky above my head,
Beneath my foot enough of earth to stand on,
I walked one day along life's beaten track,
Till suddenly, without one herald note of joy,
I found myself before a gracious presence,
Who stood with outstretched hand and smiling eyes,
While all the word she said to me was, "Come!"
And, leading, brought me to a wide, clear place,
Wherein I stood, with boundless blue above my head
Beyond the utmost gazing of my wondering eyes.

The composite photograph of the membership of these classes would include those found in positions of trust, as stenographers, leading saleswomen, cashiers, bookkeepers and other clerical relations. As one follows them, after a day of exhausting nervous strain, into one of the cheerful rooms where Miss Dyer meets them, he understands, in looking into their eager, intelligent faces, why she says: "Whatever time it demands, I cannot afford to give up 'my girls,' since association with them is such an uplifting influence." Could you hear them discuss at these meetings the essential features of municipal reform, permanent courts of arbitration, different phases of the recent bond issue, bimetallism, the text of the Monroe Doctrine and subjects of like dignity with an intelligence which would do credit to a college class of political economy, you would go away with a new impression of the working girl and thorough appreciation of Miss Dyer's efforts and influence.

Even a casual visitor would notice a significant distinction between the spirit and methods of Miss Dyer's work and the attitude of many of the philanthropic women who are striving "to elevate the working classes." Instead of dealing out information from her superior hight in a patronizing manner, taking it for granted that her hearers are lamentably ignorant concerning literature and art, Miss Dyer's position is one of recognition and respect for the education and general information of her girls, and she shows rare tact in assuming their familiarity with a standard book or a noted picture. What though the members of the class do not always realize their friend's expectations? Her belief in them acts as a spur and they are sure to return home ashamed of their ignorance and determined to remedy it. This power of inspiring study and thought in others is one of the great secrets of Miss Dyer's success, whether it be among wage-earners or leaders in society.

As women at the head of cultured homes heard of these classes of working girls, and watched the results of Miss Dyer's influence upon their lives, a desire to see and know her themselves led to the formation of morning classes in Brookline, Winchester, Newton and Boston Highlands, where representative women have grown as enthusiastic in appreciation of her helpfulness as were ever "her girls."

Unlike many another Miss Dyer has organized her work with the church as a center, giving as generously on Sunday of her time, thought and energy to her Normal Bible Class at Berkeley Temple as to the Current Events Club on a week day. The secret of her success is here revealed, for from her open Bible comes the large interpretation of the world's development down the centuries since Christ, the supreme teacher, called from their fishing boats his first disciples and intrusted to them the commission of truth-bearing to all nations. University extension this surely is, but higher and grander, for it bespeaks the final triumph of Christlikeness upon the earth, since all comprehensive study of both ancient and current history centers around the cross of Christ—the most marvelous educational gift of God to man.

SOME METHODS OF FEEDING IN DISEASE.

BY CHARLES W. HARWOOD, M. D.

Although much has been written about feeding the sick, most of the popular articles deal with dainty dishes to tempt the laggard appetites of convalescents rather than with a suitable dietary for those who are seriously ill. When a physician is employed this falls properly under his care, nevertheless some general information on the subject will not come amiss and will prove especially useful in those families where medical aid is never summoned until illness becomes serious, or where the invalid obstinately protests against calling a doctor.

An energetic watchfulness is necessary to make sure that the food is sufficient in amount as well as of proper kind. Although in some maladies and with people of strong constitutions a twenty-four hours' fast is not harmful, it should not, as a general rule, continue longer than that period, and a systematic course of feeding should be promptly begun when sickness attacks those who are weak or elderly. It is not sufficient to ask a patient what he wants, or "if he wouldn't like something to eat." Decision is irksome and often the thought of food produces repugnance. On the other hand, a little surprise may tempt the appetite. The food should be brought in at regular intervals, without previous announcement, and given to the patient in full expectation that he will eat and enjoy it. Liquid food is generally agreeable and, unless contrary to a physician's orders, may include beef tea, mutton or chicken broth, milk and strained oatmeal gruel. Soft custards and the beaten whites of eggs, with a flavor of salt, are often permissible. Koumyss, fermented milk, may be given when a slightly stimulant food is needed and barley water when there is much irritability of the stomach. This list is far from exhaustive, but the articles mentioned may be used in most diseases with perfect safety. The commercial beef extracts and milk foods are conveniently prepared and some of them are remarkably good.

Whenever a varied diet is allowable each meal may well differ from the preceding one and, unless the invalid expresses some decided preference, it is seldom advisable to let him know what is coming next. A frequently repeated portion of food becomes too much like a constantly recurring dose of medicine; it palls on the appetite and needlessly emphasizes the fact of sickness. Usually a cupful of liquid food should be given every four hours, and, by the way, a cupful should measure just half a pint. Unless it is necessary to awaken the patient for a midnight lunch, this will amount to five meals a day, or two pints and a half, an amount which is certainly small enough. All of this should be nutritious food. A cup of weak tea will not answer for a meal, although, when tea or coffee are admissible, they may be given also and preferably at the time of day when they are taken in health.

It is generally possible to arouse a sick person and administer the prescribed food and medicine. This is fortunately so in the stupor of typhoid fever, but in some diseases a profound lethargy may forbid the voluntary act of drinking. This condition too often becomes the signal for relaxation of all effort, and the patient is simply allowed to die. It may be utterly hopeless to keep up the fight for life, but if there exists the slightest chance of ultimate recovery it is well to know that, as far as feeding is concerned, one may still be master of the situation. As a matter of course, only liquid food can be used, and this should be given by half-teaspoonfuls. Having raised the patient's head, thrust the spoon far into his mouth and empty it with a downward pressure upon the back of the tongue. Reflex action is excited by the pressure and swallowing becomes automatic. This procedure must be kept up until a sufficient amount of nutriment has been taken, and it should be repeated at proper intervals.

In some affections of the throat food is often refused because the act of swallowing is so painful. This may happen, for instance, in tonsilitis and in the rare cases when rheumatism invades the larynx. Even liquids cause much distress, but small lumps of ice can be swallowed with comparative ease. Taking a hint from this fact, we may overcome the difficulty by freezing the beef tea or diluted beef extract. Procure from a druggist a dozen test tubes, which should not be much more than half an inch in diameter. Fill with the beef tea and plunge them into a freezing mixture of broken ice and salt. When taken out the warmth of the hand will release these little sticks of ice, which may then be broken up and given to the invalid.

The last resource to be mentioned and the most valuable one is, of course, rectal feeding. It may be employed in the emergencies mentioned above, but is of especial use when the stomach will not retain any food, or when there is some constriction of the alimentary canal, as in obstructing cancer or intestinal stoppage. If this treatment is to be adopted, the lower bowel should first be cleared by an enema of warm water and afterwards three-fourths of a cupful of warm liquid food, preferably with the addition of some form of digestive, should be carefully injected. This must be repeated every four or five hours to take the place of regular meals. Food thus administered is absorbed and nourishes the body, satisfying the sensations of hunger and thirst. It is certain that life can be sustained in this way for a long time, when not a particle of food is taken by the mouth.

A CRAWLING HOUSE.

BY MARY MANN MILLER.

The first time I ever saw this curious house I discovered it quite by accident in a stony brook. I was sitting on the stones idly looking into the water, never dreaming there was anything interesting near, when my eye was caught by a movement on a stone under water. I looked closer and saw what resembled a bit of gray match, tapered off at one end, and walking about by means of some legs at the other end. Wondering what in the world it could be, I took hold gently and lifted it out of the water. Immediately the legs disappeared inside, and I found that I had picked up bodily out of the water some creature's house with the owner at home! When I put it back, out came the legs and a head, very cautiously, and the house walked off. I noticed that it traveled up stream, and in a moment settled down quietly to wait for its food.

You can imagine that I was pleased with my discovery and that I began to look about pretty sharply for more interesting things. I found several more of the crawling houses, all headed up stream, and among other things some curious little empty cases glued against the side of a stone above the water. They were about three-quarters of an inch long, shaped like a tube, and perhaps you will hardly believe me when I tell you they were made of grains of sand. But it is the solemn truth, and almost any one of you can hunt up some of the cases and prove it for himself. The grains of sand, many of them transparent, were set in side by side and glued together, making a beautiful little home for some creature.

Of course I greatly wondered what was the name of the owner of the crawling house, as well as what had made the cases of sand. I soon found some one who could tell me that the cases were those of caddice worms, but it was some weeks before I learned that the others were caddice worms, too. So they were cousins, you see, and the wonderful thing about them both is that they build their own houses! It was easy to see that something must have glued the grains of sand together into that pretty tube, but how any creature could have made the crawling house was more than I could understand, for it looked as much like one piece as any snail shell that ever grew. But the wise man to whom it was sent said it really was a caddice and, moreover, that this particular kind had never been described, so I was almost as much of a discoverer as Columbus himself.

I put two or three into a tin box with water and stones and carried them back to the house, where for several days they lived in a tumbler. One crept up the side and stayed there, apparently fastened to the glass. Perhaps he glued himself there with the glue he uses to build his house. In the water was another animal, as I soon saw—a white, transparent atom of a thing, much smaller than the head of a pin, that went spinning about at a great rate. Every time it came near the caddice worm he stretched out his legs as if to seize it, but it never came near enough to be caught. Soon I noticed that the caddice stayed in his case all the time, and I began to fear he was starving, so I took a tiny bit of raw meat and, stirring up the water to make him put his head out, I let it float down to him. To my delight he caught it, folded all six legs over it and retired into his house, where I suppose he ate it. After a few days, as I saw they could not get their own living where they were, I emptied the tumbler into a stream on the place, in which I hoped the caddices could live.

Now that I had learned their name, I knew there were books that would tell me more about them, so I read everything I could find in the home library. The mother of the caddice worm is called a caddice fly, though she looks more like a moth than a fly. She lays her eggs in water, and when they hatch they are these little worms. They immediately go to work to build houses to protect themselves from the fish that like to eat them. These cases are made of different sorts of stuff, for there are a great many cousins in the caddice family and each uses a different kind of building material, such as bits of grass, stems of rushes, leaves, pieces of wood, silk that they spin themselves and even the shells of wee snails—sometimes with the live snail still in them!

They are clever little worms, for they always manage to have their houses heavy enough to keep them at the bottom of the water, and yet so light that they can be moved easily. If they could swim they would probably make them light enough to float, but they can't. Most of the caddices move about, but you remember I found the case of one kind fixed to a stone, and this one lives always in the same place, stretching its body far out of its home to get food. There is another species that actually weaves a little fish net of silk and stretches it across the water, between two stones, to catch his food. You know that many insects pass through three changes in their lives, and when they leave the egg are first some kind of crawling creature, then sleep for a while, and at last become a flying thing. The caddice worm is in the first stage, and when he comes to the second he shuts up the open end of his house and goes to sleep. But in order to breathe he must have water running through the case, so he leaves a hole in the door, or makes it like a sieve out of silk threads. Then he goes to sleep, and when he wakes up he crawls out of the water, breaks open the skin he slept in and flies away, a full-grown caddice fly.

A YELLOW PANSY.

To the wall of the old green garden
A butterfly quivering came;
His wings on the somber lichens
Played like a yellow flame.

He looked at the gay geraniums,
And the sleepy four-o-clocks,
He looked at the low lanes bordered
With the glossy growing box.

He longed for the peace and the silence,
And the shadows that lengthened there.
And his wild, wee heart was weary
Of skimming the endless air.

And now in the old green garden—
I know not how it came—
A single pansy is blooming,
Bright as a yellow flame.

And whenever a gay gust passes,
It quivers as if with pain,
For the butterfly soul within it,
Longs for the winds again.

—Helen Gray Cone.

Accept the place the divine Providence has found for you—the society of your contemporaries, the connection of events. Great men have always done so, and confided themselves, childlike, to the genius of their age, betraying their perception that the eternal was stirring at their heart, working through their hands, predominating in all their being. And we are now men, and must accept in the highest mind the same transcendent destiny; and not pinched in a corner, not cowards fleeing before a revolution, but redeemers and benefactors, pious aspirants to be noble clay, plastic under the Almighty effort, let us advance and advance on chaos and the dark.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

The period of time is brief,
'Tis the red in the red rose leaf,
'Tis the gold of a sunset sky,
'Tis the flight of a bird on high;
But one may fill the space
With such an infinite grace
That the red shall vein all time,
And the gold through the ages shine,
And the bird fly swift and straight,
To the portals of God's own gate.

Closet and Altar

The deepest prayer a human being can breathe was uttered by the Psalmist centuries ago: "O, knit my heart unto thee!"

If thoughts not our own come to us through natural objects around us, it is because an unseen Thinker has put them there for us to read. If our hearts are warmed, in deep mountain solitudes, by a love which radiates out of the inmost silence and loneliness, it is because an unseen Lover is within that throbbing vastness, wrapping us about with it as with his garment folds. The very air of some lofty wilderness retreat, sought uncompanioned, is often to a burdened heart like the presence of a sympathetic friend. They who have never wept lonely, happy tears in the presence of Nature, over the suddenly elucidated or gradually illumined mysteries of their own lives, have not guessed how near she can come to the human soul. She can speak, she does speak with the very accents of Christ. From communion with the soul's best Friend in the sanctity of her solitudes we often return to the closest earthly companionships slowly and with reluctant steps.—Lucy Larcom.

The voice of nature is none other than the voice of God. Our Lord himself tried to teach us that God, of whom we speak as so far and so silent, is very near and is speaking to us all day long. We think ourselves very pious if with narrow literalism and stupid superstition we profess to worship the words of holy books, written hundreds of years ago, as though they were the only voice in which God ever had spoken or could speak to us; and all the while we lose the whole significance of our Saviour's lessons from that other book of God whose secret lies ever open to the eyes which will read it.—F. W. Farrar.

The word were but a blank, a hollow sound,
If he that spake it were not speaking still,
If all the light and all the shade around
Were aught but issues of Almighty Will.

So, then, believe that every bird that sings,
And every flower that stars the elastic sod,
And every thought the happy summer brings,
To the pure spirit is a word of God.

—Coleridge.

Almighty Father, we do well to mark thy wondrous works and to gladden our souls with the marvelous beauty of the things thou hast made. If we neglect to do this pity us and grant us a fuller knowledge of thee. Would that we trembled more at the exquisite beauty of the garment of God; would that we could rise to the glory of the Wearer of it! But we thank thee if we may but touch the hem of thy garment, if our glad souls have been carried up to thee with the song of the birds, with the child's gladness and with the summer sunshine. Give unto us the open, observing eye, the faithful, trusting spirit, the joy in thy works by which we may come to understand the glories of the Lord. Let no word of thy writing be lost upon us, nothing that thou hast made be other than a thought of God to us. May we through the things that are made ofttimes pierce to the things of God, and by the beauty of that which thou hast expressed, learn the eternal beauty and unbroken blessedness of him from whom it comes. Amen.

54. CHARADE.

Little Salmo fontinalis,
Happy as the day is long,
With a score of speckled beauties
Speeds the rippling brook along;
ONE as frolicksome and merry
As the brownies in their dell,
Through the reeds and rushes darting,
To the brook their gladness tell.

Little Salmo fontinalis
Has a wary, watchful eye—
TWO, as the most timid maiden,
Is he ever coyly shy,
As h e marks the faintest footfall,
Seeks at once the alder's shade,
To the deepest pool receding,
Or the purling, bright cascade.

Little Salmo fontinalis,
With his scarlet dots so gay,
Daintiest of all the fishes,
Sylphlike is in sportive play;
If you once can ALL his terrors,
Watch him through the ripple's gleam,
Little Salmo fontinalis,
Sylvan fairy of the stream.

55. A BLACKSMITH'S TANGLE.

A chain is in seven pieces, and each piece has five links. The chain is to be united into one circular chain. To open a link costs four cents, and to solder it together again costs seven cents. How much less than seventy-five cents will it cost to unite the pieces into one single circular chain? G. O. FAY.

56. RIDDLES.

In cities or the country round,
Or, very often, out at sea,
This question—mystery profound—
If I could think, might puzzle me:
Since I can never walk around,
Why are three feet provided me?

II.

Of coarse, unyielding stuff, I lead
A life of ups and downs,
Greeted, whene'er I cross your road,
With weary sighs or frowns;
And, though some men the source of fame
And goodly living find me,
Few care to come before me, lest,
Perchance, they get behind me!

A solution of the "Town's Tangle," published March 26, has just arrived from friends of Tangles in Asia Minor, seven of the members of the Junior Class in the Bardezag (Ismidt) High School having correctly worked out the problem, which was given them as an exercise in bookkeeping. The principal states that it is only by great good fortune that a Congregationalist ever succeeds in reaching them, on account of the interference of the Turkish authorities with their mail.

Another Tangle of a practical kind has been handed in for this week by a correspondent. While it looks easy and is less confusing, perhaps, than the bookkeeping problem, there is good reason to believe that not all who attempt to solve it will give the correct answer. Try it.

ABOUT PEOPLE.

Mark Twain is said to have a curious aversion to writing while in the presence of others, so that even his most intimate friends have never seen him at his literary work. This was a peculiarity of Sir Walter Scott also, who used to rise at four in the morning and do his writing while the members of his household were still in bed.

Russia's young empress has shown her courage in discountenancing the use of tobacco by the ladies of the court of St. Petersburg, for nearly every woman in royal circles is addicted to smoking. The czarina is credited with saying that a cigarette in the mouth of a woman is as bad as an oath in that of a man, and she has requested that neither her ladies-in-waiting nor the ladies of the court should approach her as long as there is the slightest aroma of tobacco about their persons. It is said that Queen Victoria is the only other sovereign in Europe who manifests so strong an aversion to tobacco.

Romantic stories are told of the courtship and happy married life of Major McKinley and his lovely wife. It is interesting to learn that a common interest in Sunday school work first drew them together. In the town where they lived she was teacher of a large Bible class in the First Presbyterian Church and he was superintendent of the Sunday school in the First Methodist Episcopal Church. In going to and from their respective services they passed each other at a certain corner, and often lingered to talk over their work together until the time came when they decided to join forces and walk in the same direction for the rest of their lives.

When the emperor of Germany visited Venice a gala performance was arranged in his honor for Sunday evening at the principal theater. It has long been the custom in Venice to have special attractions at the theater on Sunday, and in this instance, of course, a supreme effort was made to honor royalty. But to the Countess Morosini, who was the bearer of the invitation, the Protestant ruler gave a firm, though courteous, refusal, explaining that since his accession to the throne he had never attended a theater on Sunday. Whether this carefulness arises from his own increased sense of responsibility to God, or from deference to the sentiment of his people, we may hail it as a hopeful sign for nation and ruler.

Individual Strawberry Shortcakes

Sift with one quart of flour two teaspoonfuls Cleveland's Baking Powder and one-half teaspoon salt. Rub in shortening (one-half cup butter and one tablespoon lard) and wet with enough sweet milk or water to make a soft dough. Handle as little as possible and roll out about one inch thick. Cut the desired size with biscuit cutter and bake twenty minutes in a quick oven. Break in half and butter.

Have ready a quart of berries, crushed and sweetened with one small cup of granulated sugar. Place lower half of biscuit, buttered side up, on plate on which it is to be served; cover with crushed berries, then on top the upper half, buttered side up, cover again with crushed berries, and serve at once with or without cream or strawberry sauce.

The Conversation Corner.

THE Corner has been taken up for two weeks with Anne Bradstreet, Pomiuk (Gabriel) and the seaside church, but now we must get back to our legitimate business of asking and answering questions and reading Cornerers' letters. I can give you specimens of each without going very deep into the drawer.

NORWOOD, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: Will you kindly tell me the names of the presidents of the Third Republic of France up to the present date, especially those who have held office since 1890?

EVERETT R.

A school teacher came into my library just after I received this letter and I passed the ? over to her—I have noticed that real enthusiastic school teachers know almost everything—and she replied: 1870 (the date of the great war with Germany), provisional government; 1871, M. Thiers; 1873, Marshal McMahon; 1879, M. Grevy; 1887, M. Carnot, assassinated; 1894, M. Casimir-Perier; 1895, M. Faure. Most of these men seem to have ended their term of service by resignation. Why? Presidents of the United States never resign—and seldom any other public officers. I should think that would be a good subject to study up. Are the French presidents elected for four years? Is their relation to the Ministry and to the Assembly (answering to our Congress) different from our government?

FRUITVALE, CAL.

Dear Mr. Martin: Can you tell me who wrote "Mary had a little lamb," and when it was written?

S. M. F.

If this questioner had kept an indexed Scrap-book, she would find under "Mary and her lamb, authorship of poem," reference to page —, where would be pasted the Corner of Dec. 6, 1894, with the whole story. The authorship is there attributed to Mrs. Sarah J. Hale and the reasons given. I have since had various letters in favor of another author, but none that seem to break the force of those reasons.

RED ROOF (MASS.).

Dear Mr. Martin: I want to put a puzzel in The Congregationalist. Will you please put it in? Why is an elephant like a wheelbarrow? Just put in the question and a few words as you think. I will tell you the answer, but don't you put it in.

With much love, CONSTANCE P.

Can the Cornerers tell that "puzzel"? I am sure I could not, except with Constance's secret postscript.

BOSTON.

Dear Mr. Martin: L. C. D. [Corner of May 28] can find Miles O'Reilley's poem to Secretary Stanton in a volume, "The Life and Adventures of Private Miles O'Reilley," published in 1866 by Carleton of New York, page 42. Yours truly, A BIG CORNERER.

NORFOLK, CT.

Dear Mr. Martin: Today when The Congregationalist came [March 5] I looked at the Conversation Corner and saw Raymond G.'s question, "Which is of more benefit to mankind, a moss-covered stone, or a rolling stone?" The other day I was reading about Peter Cooper. The book told about the different trades he used to do and that he did not make any money from them. After a while he thought of the old maxim, "A rolling stone gathers no moss." He thought that he was a rolling stone and so he stopped rolling. I think that a moss-covered stone is the more benefiting. CLAUDE K.

No doubt Claude is right. A boy—or anybody else—would better stick to one thing, patiently and thoroughly, and, if it is an honest thing and he puts brains into it, he will succeed some time. Certainly, the money rolled in upon Peter Cooper and he did great good with it. Have you ever heard of Cooper Institute, New York city?

WORCESTER, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: In answer to Dwight C.'s question in the Corner of May 21, "What constitutes a set of stamps?" I would say that it includes all the different values of one issue. An "issue" is a series of stamps of any number of values, put forth by a government at a certain time or for a certain period. The "Columbian stamps" were an "issue," and one of each of them, from one cent to five dollars, would be a "set." A short time ago my brother, a friend and I went on our bicycles to some woods on the outskirts of the city. There is a pond adjoining the woods, and near it we spent most of the day and had a fine time. We made couches and seats out of large, flat stones, so that we could lie down or sit up, and read, play games or do anything else. We saw several birds that are uncommon in this vicinity. Among them we saw a swamp whistler, scarlet tanager and an indigo bird. After our lunch we rode out into the country and got some wild flowers.

EDGAR B.

I hope those couches were made of "moss-covered stones"! But that was a sensible and inexpensive way of spending a holiday, only I suppose you had to buy your bicycles to begin with. I wonder how many Corner boys —and girls—have "wheels."

Our Florentine correspondent of last week did not have time to describe the cats he saw in Italy, but I have, instead, any number of cat stories from home members:

ALFRED, ME.

Dear Mr. Martin: I have a black cat. Her name is Topsy. We have a lovely little horse named Gypsey. We have a canary named Cate. He is about twelve years old. I am much interested in Pomiuk. I am sorry he is so sick. I am glad he is better. I go to school. Am I a Cornerer? MARGARET D.

Yes, read the certificate, and see if you are not. While copying the above this letter comes in. Is Lydia's Gypsey a cousin to Margaret's?

BRIMFIELD, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am nine years old. May I be a Cornerer? I have a pony named Gypsey. I have a sister and two brothers. Anna and I ride with the pony nearly every day. Has Sarah Noah a pony? LYDIA C.

No, nothing but a bicycle.

NEW BRITAIN, CT.

Dear Mr. Martin: . . . I send you my picture to put in the Corner Album. We have a gray cat with white toes, named Tippytoes. The black cat I wrote about (Cæsar Augustus, etc.) ran away or was killed for his skin. I have now over a thousand varieties of stamps.

HOWARD W.

SHERBURNE, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am a little boy eight years old. I go to school. I have no brother or sister, but I have two kitties, one named Tommy and a kitten named Tiger. I have a dog, his name is Nero. He will sit in a chair and speak for something to eat. He is so large he sometimes falls out of the chair when he tries to sit down. I have some hens and sell the eggs and help buy my clothes. My mamma reads the Corner to me every week.

IVAN P.

KANSAS CITY, MO.

Dear Mr. Martin: I saw some nice stories about cats in the Corner and I am going to tell you one. We have a very large black cat. One day our girl made a very large yellow pumpkin pie (and it takes a big pie to go around in our family) and put it on the pantry shelf to keep till we should want it. Next morning when we went to the pantry there was not much pie left—most of it was pan. Snowball had made a bed of it and gone down cellar before we came down stairs. Wasn't that funny? MARY S.

It certainly was! Did he eat up his bed when he left it in the morning?

One more letter— [Not another one this week, sir!—D. F.]

Mr. Martin

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

Squirrels in Washington. Not the capital of our nation, but the northwestern Pacific State. It is a continual source of regret that that name was adopted for the new and prosperous State, for that and the national capital are constantly confounded, compelling every one to stop and think whether the city or the State is meant. It was so entirely unnecessary, too, as the name of the Father of his Country is perpetuated in the beautiful capital on the Potomac, while the sweet sounding Indian language would have afforded euphonious and appropriate names for the State. For my part, I would have preferred Walla Walla to Washington! But this has nothing to do with the

Squirrel Convention at Spokane. The Scrap-book referred to it in advance, and now some Corner friend there sends papers about it. In Spokane County nearly 400,000 squirrel tails had been brought to the commissioners and paid for at the rate of one cent each. It is estimated that that represented about one-third of the number actually slaughtered—say, one million in all. One man presented nearly 5,000, which he had captured in eleven days, with an ounce of strychnine and a Marlin rifle. But notwithstanding this success the pest continues to increase, and immense amounts of grain are destroyed. The most hopeful tidings were received from certain localities, viz., that some contagious disease had suddenly seized squirreldom and was killing thousands. It was hoped that this epidemic would spread and accomplish what giant powder poison and rifles had failed to do. Meantime, the convention called for the aid of the next legislature in continuing the bounty and perhaps permitting the governor to offer a reward for the discovery of some germ or virus that would annihilate the entire rodent population. It will be the ruling question in politics there at the next State election; perhaps, also, the Washingtonians will ask Mr. McKinley and Mr. —— (I do not recall the name of the other candidate), not their position on the tariff or silver policy, but what they will do about the Spokane squirrels!

Moth Killer Wanted. In Massachusetts, as well as in that Pacific State, nature is asked to help man. Men and money cannot conquer the gypsy moth, and now it is hoped that some bird can be found that will eat the gypsy. If any of our Corner Scrap-bookers can discover in their vacation rambles a bird with an appetite for gypsy moths they will win reward and renown by communicating with the State Commissioners.

Bunker Hill in 1775. This paper will go to press on Bunker Hill Day—unless D. F. and the mailing boys insist on a holiday—on which date the Daughters of the Revolution are to erect a cairn at Quincy, on the very spot where Abigail Adams, the wife of John Adams, took her little boy, John Quincy Adams, eight years old, to watch the smoke and listen to the guns of the battle in Charlestown. If any of our daughters are there I hope they will report about the matter.

What the Children Say—Figuratively. How many senses have we? We have two senses, right and wrong.—What are the three principal mountains of Scotland? Ben Nevis, Ben Lomond and Ben Jonson.—What are the four seasons? Pepper, salt, mustard and vinegar. —For five, a New York lady sends this of a little girl who was committing to memory the numbers in French. Five—cinq pronounced sank—she thought she could fix by associating it with Sank-ey. But when she came to the class she remembered the other evangelist, and instead of cinq, said Mocd!

LESSON FOR JUNE 21. REVIEW.

BY SOPHIA C. SUTHERLAND.

During the quarter we have considered some of the addresses of Christ delivered in the last six months of his earthly life, have followed him to the cross, and have seen him, triumphant over death, ascend into heaven.

He has appeared before us pre-eminently as a prophet, foretelling the future and "forth-telling" the word of God; and the substance of his message has been largely determined by his approaching death, for the opposition of the Scribes and Pharisees, which grew daily more pronounced and violent, elicited from our Lord scorching rebuke and solemn warning, as well as the bold statement of certain truths to which he could not wisely have given utterance at an earlier period.

Let us consider some things which characterize the teaching of Christ as shown in these lessons, and then notice the subject matter of his teaching at this critical time.

I. CHARACTERISTICS OF CHRIST'S TEACHING.

1. He frequently made use of parables. The reason he gave for employing them early in his ministry, namely, that they at once "concealed and revealed" truth, probably accounts for the increasing frequency with which he used that method of instruction during this period of violent opposition and vanishing opportunity.

2. He expounded and applied the Scriptures. His parable of the wicked husbandmen was driven home to the consciences of his hearers by the quotation, "The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner"; while the figure of the vineyard employed in the parable was one frequently used by the Old Testament prophets, and was undoubtedly selected because its familiarity would insure for it a quick apprehension and ready application. After his resurrection from the writings of Moses and the prophets and from the Psalms, Christ made clear to his disciples the meaning of his death.

3. His teaching was often disappointing and unsatisfactory. He never gratified idle curiosity, never allowed his hearers to rest in the mere knowledge of the truth. In his view every truth had its corresponding duty, every privilege its responsibility. Thus his teaching was intensely practical and disturbing to false security, and frequently aroused personal hostility.

4. He was guided by circumstances in his choice of topics. While Luke seldom gives a clew to the exact time when these addresses were delivered, he many times mentions the incident which called them forth. To the question, "Are there few that be saved?" Jesus replied: "Strive to enter into the strait gate." The "pious platitude"—"Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God"—called out the parable of the great supper. The sneer of the self-righteous—"This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them"—furnished occasion for the revelation of God as the loving Father. The parable of Dives and Lazarus was spoken to the covetous Pharisees who derided the saying of Jesus—"Ye cannot serve God and mammon." As Christ approached Jerusalem, and popular expectation looked for his immediate establishment of the kingdom of God, he endeavored to correct this misapprehension by the use of the parable of the pounds, while that of the wicked husbandmen was his last tender warning and appeal to his own people. The strife for pre-eminence among the disciples was his opportunity to teach that privilege implied duty. The only miracle which has engaged our attention opened the way for Christ to emphasize the unloveliness of ingratitude.

II. THE SUBJECT MATTER OF CHRIST'S TEACHING.

Although the particular topics which he treated were determined by passing incidents, he never lost sight of the events which lay immediately before him, nor failed to warn the Jews of their peril in rejecting their Messiah, while to his own disciples, so soon to be bereaved, he had a message of instruction, caution and encouragement. Let us try to classify his teachings that we may clearly see their application to our own lives.

1. Christ predicted future events. (a) His most marked prophecy was uttered to his disciples as he looked upon temple and city from the slope of Mount Olivet after his last day of public instruction, and while reserving its primary fulfillment in the destruction of Jerusalem, its accomplishment will not be fully realized until he comes to judge the world. Repeatedly Jesus foretold in parable the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles, his own death and second coming and the final judgment. He also predicted Peter's denial of his Lord and the persecutions awaiting the apostles.

(b) Closely allied to his prophecies were Christ's revelations concerning destiny. He taught that rewards and punishments follow immediately upon departure from this life; that destiny is determined by character as manifested in the life, and is unchanging; and his interview with the thief on the cross teaches that character depends upon relation to him who is "able to save unto the uttermost."

2. Christ revealed God. Under the figure of the gracious host, the loving father, the trusting master, he sets forth the love of God: but in the indignation of the host whose hospitality was slighted, and of the master whose trust was betrayed and whose authority despised, he showed how the element of justice enters into love, and revealed "the goodness and the severity of God," whose love is ennobled by justice and whose justice is tempered by mercy. But his was not a revelation in word alone. Jesus himself was the most complete and comprehensive manifestation of the Father, and his sacrificial death expressed at once God's hatred of sin and his love for the sinner, while it proved him "just and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." "In the dark cloud that hung over the cross, we read the bright inscription, 'God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself.'"

3. Christ pointed out duty. Our Saviour taught that the service of God was both a privilege and a duty, and faithfully warned of temptations to doubt and discouragement. The way is narrow—strive to enter. The invitation urgent—accept. The Father's love undying—return. Life is a service—be humble. Life is a probation—live for the future. Sin is as leprosy—for healing give thanks. In prayer be not boastful, but confess sin with the humility and trustfulness of a little child. A trust has been committed—thus highly honored, be faithful. Fierce temptations will assail—watch and pray. Such are some of the many precious lessons which come to us with the same freshness and force with which they fell from his lips centuries ago.

4. Christ expounded the plan of redemption. During these last months he more than once hinted at the significance of his death: but until he had accomplished the work of atonement he could not fully declare its meaning, for his disciples were not prepared to understand it. After his resurrection, however, the germ of the salvation proclaimed by the apostles and recorded in the epistles is found in his teaching. As the instruction of the last half year of our Lord's earthly life centered around the cross, so the teaching of the risen Christ illumined Calvary, and in its light the disciples went forth with joy, as we may today, to live and labor for him who "liveth, and was dead, and is alive forevermore."

THE APPROACHING SUNDAY SCHOOL CONVENTION.

Already the advance guard of delegates to the International Sunday School Convention is beginning to arrive in Boston, and before another week passes by the usual throngs on the city streets will be re-enforced by hundreds of men and women whom the discerning eye will recognize as delegates to this gathering.

The roll of the convention can properly include nearly 2,900 accredited delegates, since every State, Territory and province in America is entitled to representation. Naturally not all of them will avail themselves of this privilege to the extent allowed, but inasmuch as the gathering attracts a great many persons who are not officially related to it it is safe to predict that from three to five thousand persons from outside the city will come hither for the express purpose of attending the meeting.

This estimate of the size of the body gives a hint of its importance and its representative character. First of all, let it be understood that it is interdenominational, and that while New England has never had an International Convention they have been held every three years since 1875, the last being in session in St. Louis from Aug. 31 to Sept. 2, 1893. Previous to the Baltimore gathering in 1875 at irregular intervals there had been five so-called national convocations, the first being held as long ago as 1832 in New York, when the American Sunday School Union issued the call and Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen was the presiding officer.

The most notable of these national conventions was that at Indianapolis in 1872, its distinguishing feature being the adoption of the uniform system of Bible lessons. All but ten of the 254 delegates present there committed themselves to the plan and the next day the first lesson committee, consisting of five ministers and five laymen, was chosen, each of the following denominations having two representatives: Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians and Congregationalists. Bishop John H. Vincent was immediately chosen chairman, which position he has kept up to the present time. The committee was chosen to serve six years, and thus in the twenty-four years since it was established there have been four lesson committees, though as a matter of fact the composition of them has not undergone any great change, particularly during the last twelve years. The committee meets once a year and is in session long enough to accomplish the important tasks committed to it, which are, of course, facilitated by the labor performed by individuals in the intervening periods. Their original instructions were to select a course of Bible lessons for a series of years not exceeding seven, the understanding being that the scheme should embrace the whole Bible and alternate between the Old and the New Testaments.

Since the International Lesson system—for it became this speedily through British indorsement of the plan—was established organized Sunday school work has taken rapid forward strides. Almost every State now has its interdenominational organization, supplemented by county or district and township associations. Stated conventions and institutes are held, which have not only aroused enthusiasm for the cause, but have been exceedingly profitable from an educational point of view.

Two of the most prominent men in organizing and extending Sunday school work are Bishop J. H. Vincent and Rev. Warren Randolph, D. D., respectively president and secretary of the International Lesson Committee. Not second to them in ability and zeal is B. F. Jacobs of Chicago, who may be regarded as the business head and front of the organization, having been chairman of the international executive committee for many years and having served as president of the World's Second Sunday School Convention, held in St. Louis three years ago. Mr. Jacobs is an indefatigable worker, and there are few regions of the country where he is not personally known in Sunday school circles, while he is also highly esteemed by many to whom he is known only by reputation. Pictures of these three gentlemen appear on our cover page.

Another noteworthy figure at the Boston convention will be William Reynolds, international field superintendent, who travels all over the country in the interests of the cause, attending annually not less than twenty-five State conventions. The name of Henry Clay Trumbull ought to be mentioned too among the pillars of the cause. He was chairman of the executive committee of the national convention that adopted the plan for the present International Lessons, and as a missionary for years for the American Sunday School Union, as editor of the Sunday School Times and as author of books on the Sunday school that have become authoritative he wields an immense influence.

The preparation for this great convention began in Boston many months ago, and an efficient committee of forty has been attending to the various arrangements. Free entertainment will be extended to the delegates. The gatherings are to be held in the new Tremont Temple, which has an aggregate seating capacity of over 5,000, and Park Street Church will be utilized for the overflow meetings. There will be, under Dr. Peloubet's auspices, an exhibition of modern Sunday school appliances. The program has been carefully made up, and while there is no lack of eloquent and noteworthy platform speakers like Dr. D. J. Burrell, Dr. A. F. Schauffler, Dr. H. C. Woodruff, D. L. Moody and John Wanamaker, representatives of the rank and file of workers will be heard, and doubtless the smaller conferences, at which personal experiences are freely rehearsed, will prove not less valuable than the larger meetings. The chairman of the local committee is Mr. G. W. Coleman, who served as vice-chairman of the famous Committee of Thirteen which arranged for the great Endeavor Convention here last July. Mr. W. N. Hartshorn, chairman of the executive committee of the Massachusetts State Association, and the secretary, Mr. H. S. Conant, have also been giving unsparingly of their time and thought for many weeks to the end that every preparation should be made that will conduce to the success of the gathering.

The committee of arrangements has not ignored the natural desire of many of those coming to the convention to see historical shrines hereabouts. An excursion to Plymouth has been arranged for June 27, the day after the convention adjourns. The Sunday school children of that town will act as guides to the visitors and serve them a dinner. Another outing has Old Orchard Beach and the White Mountains for its objective point, and still another takes in Lexington and Concord.

The Congregational Sunday School Superintendents' Union times its June festival to coincide with the convention, utilizing Monday evening, June 22, for a special rally at Berkeley Temple, when Mr. B. F. Jacobs, Rev. Drs. John Potts, W. H. Davis and A. A. Berle will speak.

The impending conflict of partisans and patriots has impelled the editor of the Western Christian Advocate to formulate the following rules for Christian people, which are so sensible that they deserve to be quoted:

I will not, during this campaign, neglect any religious duty, but, on the contrary, I will increase my dilligence in the Lord's service. I will pray daily that the best principles and the best men may prevail. I will carry my religion into politics, and keep it there all through the campaign. If any man in my party circulates scandals, I will rebuke him and do my best to suppress the scandals. I will do my utmost to put down lying, vote-stealing, and all the other devilish practices of politics. When I find myself becoming dangerously heated in feeling, I will retire and pray for a sober mind."

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, June 28–July 4. True Manliness and Womanliness. Ps. 37: 1-11.

It is to the credit of the race that the words "manly" and "womanly" stand for lofty qualities. When we contrast them with the adjective "brutish" we see how noble they are. This is not because some of the lower animals are not affectionate and useful, or because some men are not base and treacherous; but the thought of the world conceives of man as moving constantly upward and forward despite the tendencies downward that work within him, so that in our day it is not easy to apply an adjective to a man that means more than "manly," or to a woman one that has a holier significance than "womanly."

It is true that the ideal of manhood has grown as time has passed on. There have been days when to the popular mind he was most of a man who could kill the largest number of his enemies, or bring back the biggest game from a hunting expedition, or leap the furthest in athletic contests; and now and then, even in modern times, it almost looks as if the best fellow in college was the one who made the finest record at the bat or on the track. But down deep in the heart of humanity is the power to appreciate that which is best in man and the disposition to apply to it, and to it chiefly, the adjective "manly." The Latin word for man, vir, whose primary meaning is virtue, proves this.

It is important for us in our youth to get the right idea about manhood and womanhood. We are apt to think that to arrive at man's estate will make us manly; that when we can wear men's clothes and do all the things which they do, and enjoy the freedom and independence of a life which is not accountable to parents and guardians, then we shall be men indeed. But only as we have in us that which corresponds to the idea of man as God originally created him have we any right to be considered "manly." The best place to find out what is God's idea of a man is the Bible. When descriptions of him, drawn by Psalmists, prophets and the makers of the Proverbs, were not sufficient, God put a perfect man in the world, by actual contact with whom the world learned what true manliness is. So Christ becomes the measure for every man, and every boy, even, who is trying to imitate him earns the right to be called manly—deserves it, in fact, far more than some who have come to years of maturity without rising into the life of the Spirit.

This Psalm brings out at least two of the marks of real manhood. First, the repose of spirit—the freedom from worry, a mastery of self, by virtue of which one lives in the world calmly and properly related to his fellowmen. The second evidence of manhood is a fellowship with God. For that man was made. An eagle imprisoned in a cage ceases practically after a time to be an eagle. He was meant to soar in the upper air, to dart freely hither and thither. The proper atmosphere for a human being is God's heaven, and unless he breathes that air day by day he becomes daily less and less of a man.

BOOK REVIEWS.

A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom, Andrew Dickson White, LL. D, late President of Cornell University. These two stately volumes are given to a world embracing study of the historical relations of an advancing science and a resisting, but continually defeated, dogmatism of traditional theology. The whole field of knowledge and research, physical, anthropological, historical and literary is reviewed with a continually recurring result. Sample chapters are, From Creation to Evolution, From Genesis to Geology, The Fall of Man and Anthropology, From Miracles to Medicine, From Diabolism to Hysteria. Indeed, the whole work may be said to constitute one long and able sermon to the dogmatic theologians on the text, ne sutor ultra crepidam—"let the shoemaker stick to his last." The author shows that dogmatic theology has, throughout the history of modern thought, opposed the advance of science at every point, and at every point has been beaten because it went beyond its proper province. And to much of this arraignment we agree that there is no choice but to confess judgment.

It would be a curious speculation to consider what the effect would have been if from the first the church had allowed the explorers of nature to have their way. Scientific thought would have escaped much polemic bitterness of tone, but might it not have lost in solidity? The friction of the banks, as Captain Eads proved to us, has much to do with the depth of the stream.

Over against this fallibility of a dogmatic and meddling theology, of course, is to be set the long history of hasty scientific conclusions and outgrown scientific theories. Even the abandoned church traditions in regard to nature were, most of them, older than, and nearly all of them in their first origin independent of, the church. The fathers of the church took the inherited scientific theories of their time and defended them with a zeal and bigotry which we cannot, in the light of experience, approve. Throughout the long controversy the scientific side has had the huge advantage of being aggressive in its attack and constructive in its method, but it has developed at times a bigotry of prejudice and hatred toward religion which is quite comparable with that which the author of this book condemns on the part of dogmatic Christian teachers.

The hope of the church is in the advance of knowledge which will settle the lines of that new constructive thought which seems to be opening before her. What science can teach she desires to know, and she is not afraid of truth from whatever quarter it appears. But it must be recognized that the work is to be done over and over again, so far as its scientific basis is concerned, as the leaders of science shift their ground and change their conclusions.

Dr. White's method might be turned against himself in some departments of his study. In New Testament criticism, for example, where he has necessarily gathered his materials at second hand, the latest scholarship has by no means settled upon the conclusions in regard to the history of the synoptic gospels or the authorship of the fourth gospel to which he appeals so confidently. Nor is the church ready to abandon its belief in the activity of spiritual intelligencies in the life of the world because its members both long ago and today have misused that belief, and its phenomena are not subject to the instruments of sense perception. It is well for theology to recognize its limitations and acknowledge that there are matters which it must take upon the testimony of science, but it will be necessary for science on its part to recognize that there are experiences which it has no instruments to test and can only study in their effects.

Our chief interest in the book, however, is on the practical side. Dr. White writes as a Christian, and allows Christianity a large and, within limits, controlling element in the life of the race. We wish he had given us a constructive chapter defining those limits as he understands them, and had told us what part in his own thought of the life of humanity he assigns to Christian teachers. We can gather much of this from what he says negatively, but we suspect that he would find himself in such an utterance giving back with the right hand something of what he has taken away with the left. [D. Appleton & Co. 2 vols. $5.00.]

HISTORY.

History of Prussia, by Herbert Tuttle, Vol. IV. (1756–7). This posthumous volume of Professor Tuttle's history, treating of the most momentous period of the Seven Years War, reminds us of the great loss to historical scholarship in the author's death. One secret of his success in this, as in his three preceding volumes, was the natural manner in which he came to his theme. As a foreign correspondent in Berlin, he became deeply interested in questions of European statecraft. Then a happy acquaintance with men who could open to him the archives at Berlin suggested a study of the rise of the Prussian constitution. His first volume carried the theme down to the accession of Frederick the Great. Two others treated of the reign of Frederick from 1740 to 1756. This volume tells of the beginning of the great struggle of Prussia, aided only and feebly by England, against the combined power of Austria, France, Russia and Sweden. It is not written in the uncut diamond style of Carlyle's Friedrich, nor with the polished periods of Macaulay's essay, but in good, readable English. Professor Tuttle is something of an iconoclast as to popular traditions, but we can depend upon his statement of fact. Of the three chapters in this book, the first tells of the occupation of Saxony. The second deals in an instructive way with the plots and policies of the courts during the winter of 1756–7. The third is devoted to the "year of battles." Prague, Kollin, Rossbach and Leuthen each leaves its vivid impress upon us. The volume is introduced by a valuable biographical sketch of Professor Tuttle written by his friend, Dr. Herbert B. Adams. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50.]

The Making of Pennsylvania, by Sydney George Fisher, B. A. Mr. Fisher rightly says that the history of Pennsylvania cannot be written without a full consideration of the race and religious peculiarities which were combined in its heterogeneous population. He then proceeds to show his lack of equipment for the task he has proposed by a description of the different religions which is at many points so prejudiced and so devoid of sympathy as to give altogether a false perspective. For example, he lumps the Scotch Irish of Pennsylvania with the Puritans of New England, and describes Calvinism with such falsehood of exaggeration and disproportion that it becomes a mere caricature. Oddly enough, too, he interjects the story of the "Molly Maguires" as a parenthesis in the history of the original Scotch-Irish! Again, he has the bad taste to use the terms "Churchmen" of the handful of Episcopalians and "Dissenters" of the vast majority of Christians in the colony. Aside from these and other evidences of a certain narrowness of view, and, perhaps, unconscious prejudice in the field of Christian history, we have found in the book an interesting account of the "elements of the population and the formative influences that created one of the greatest of the American States." [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.50.]

We have six parts out of a projected thirty of The People's Standard History of the United States, by Edward S. Ellis. It is finely printed and fully illustrated by halftone and wood engravings, full page and imbeded in the text. Some of these are rather fanciful and melodramatic but are exceedingly well printed. We reserve comment on the text until we have the work as a whole. [Woodfall Co. Paper, 50 cents per part.]

RELIGIOUS.

A Year's Sermons, by S. D. McConnell, D. D. It is a hopeful sign of the times that recognition of the religious side of life grows with our secular newspapers, if it does not yet grow into anything like its true proportion. These sermons were first published as editorials in the Philadelphia Press, and were addressed to "that large, and, it is to be feared, growing class of men and women who are not hostile to religion, but who are outside the circle of Christ's disciples." The sermons are brief, simple, but comprehensive in thought, and the style is plain and conversational. There is a wide range of topics and they are well chosen for the purpose of claiming attention and opening the way to practical help. [Thomas Whittaker. $1.25.]

The Deeper Christian Life, by Andrew Murray. Fellowship with God, Privilege and Experience, Out of and Into are the titles of some of the chapters of this little book of devout and spiritual discourses. The book will be useful, we are sure, in deepening the Christian life of those who read it. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 50 cents.]

The Glorious Lord, by Rev. F. B. Meyer. This is a little book of sermons containing much valuable material from the author's treasury. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 50 cents.]

Tales of Trust, Embracing Authentic Accounts of Providential Guidance, Assistance and Deliverance, written and selected by H. L. Hastings. This book has a treasury of anecdotes, gathered from many sources, which will be helpful in confirming and suggesting faith in God's personal care and love. It is well printed on a highly glazed paper of a distinctly brown tint. [H. L. Hastings. $1.00.]

STORIES.

Weir of Hermiston, an unfinished romance by Robert Louis Stevenson. This is a magnificent fragment carried far enough before the lamented author's death to show that it might have been the cap sheaf of his fame. In the power, insight and skill of its completed passages it is hardly possible to overestimate it. The grim father stands ou before us with a fascinating and uncanny life which takes hold of our heart as well as our imagination, and the picture of the loneliness of the son among his moors is hardly less vital. If our readers will accept our advice they will read the book slowly, not for the story, which is completed quite sufficiently indeed, if baldly, by the editor's notes for those who must know how a plot turns out, but for the series of pictures of nature and of human nature which are not only wonderful in themselves, but more wonderful in being written far away from the land and life which they portray. Would that the author could have turned from lesser things to complete the picture! [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50 ]

Sunrise Stories, by Roger Riordan and Tozo Takyangi, present to the gratified reader new features of many sided Japan in specimens of its literature, charming bits of poetry, under head of Songs of Two Cities, accounts of myths in the Age of the Gods, through the Buddhistic era, with descriptions of popular plays nearer the present time. The author asserts that this generation, as well as its predecessor, is devoid of artistic creation from having been too busy in making history for future poets and novelists to build upon. An admirable chapter in conclusion gives a clear and forcible analysis, from an inside point of view, of revolutionary and progressive Japan, carrying great weight as being written by a most thoughtful and intelligent Japanese. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.]

The esprit common to French writings is not wanting in Léon de Tinseau's In Quest of an Ideal, given to us in English by Florence Belknap Gilmour. Dealing with the social problem, it abounds in arguments for capital versus labor, skillfully woven into an interesting tale where "a lady of quality," given to fads, introduces the incongruous element of a socialistic leader into her drawing-room. One of the heroines, a strong character, not being sure of her own heart, loses her lover on account of her socialistic affiliations just as she discovers how dear he is to her. The author's too evident desire to punish her for her creed compels our sympathy for her, and withdraws it from the hero in his speedy marriage with a young dévote, who is really charming and deserves admiration for her religious faith and sincere goodness of character. [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.00.]

In Mark Heffron, by Alice Ward Bailey, we have a thoroughly wide-awake, readable book, treating of the various fads and follies of this effervescing age from Buddhism to Delsarte, giving a large share of attention to hypnotism and Christian Science. Although the action of the story is not always smooth, the author has used her eyes and her mind to advantage and gives a healthy impression as to the value of those respective cults that enter so largely into the composition of the "new woman." She makes her hero see the result of giving expression to crude thinking in molding young lives not to their gain—a much needed lesson at the present day. [Harper & Bros. $1.25.]

Stories whose interest hinges on a mysterious murder, with an innocent person unjustly accused, etc., always find readers, though having little claim to originality. Of such is The Heart of a Mystery, by T. W. Speight. A clandestine marriage, suspected of being no marriage at all, but in the end proved true and legal; a dismal, but wholly aristocratic, old house in the country; an unforgiving elderly relative and a beautiful young lady, are all parts of a story of average merit, but interesting reading. [R. F. Fenno & Co. $1.25.]

Phillis of Philistia, by F. F. Moore, is a novel too light and trifling even for the class of literature popularly known as summer reading. Its moral tone is not of the highest, to say nothing of its slurs against the church, the Bible and against foreign missionaries as well as its absurd caricature of an ultra-liberal English rector. The only pleasant feature of the book is the devoted friendship of the heroine for a weak woman whom she saves from breaking her marriage vows. [Cassell Pub. Co. $1.00.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Dictionary of Quotations (English), by Lieut.-Col. Philip Hugh Dalbiac, M. P. No book of this kind can pretend to be absolutely complete, there being no fixed limit to quoted and quotable sayings. This book has an immense range and is particularly strong in its modern quotations. As it must cater to all tastes it would be idle to object that it errs, if anywhere, on the side of too great comprehensiveness. We are, indeed, only too glad to get such a wide range to refer to. We like the simple alphabetical arrangement of the quotations and the indices are full and helpful. The print, though not large, is clear and the paper good. [Macmillan & Co. $2.00.]

In an admirably just and discriminating essay on Mural Painting in the Boston Public Library, Ernest F. Fenollosa takes up a subject which is of special interest to artists and to the thoughtful public. The essay deserves a wide reading among students and lovers of art and the would-be intelligent public. [Boston: Curtis & Co. Paper, 25 cents.]

The Psychology of Attention, by Prof. Théodule Ribot of the College of France. This book considers the mechanism of attention under the three heads of Spontaneous or Natural, Voluntary or Artificial, and Morbid States of Attention. It deals with physiological psychology and will be of great interest to students, but is rather too technical for the general reader. [Open Court Publishing Co. 75 cents; paper, 25 cents.]

In The Non-Heredity of Inebriety, Dr. Leslie E. Keeley attempts the task of disproving the commonly accepted theory that inebriety may be inherited. We do not think he fully makes out his case, which indeed is a difficult one because it involves proving a negative, but his name, in connection with the well-known "cure" of which he was the inventor, will attract attention to the book, and its arguments deserve careful consideration. [S. C. Griggs & Co. $1.50.]

A brief extract from the introduction will suffice to give our readers an idea of The Veil Lifted, by H. Martyn Kennard: "I shall point out in the following pages," he says, "that the Hamites and the Semites were the Hebrews and Israelites of the Old Testament . . . that the Pharaoh Apepi, the last of so called Hyksos kings, was the Hebrew sun god Masu, or Moses; and the Pharaoh Aahmes, who supplanted him, was the Joseph, Joshua, or Jahveh, the Lord God of Israel. That the Samuel, the Saul, and the Esh-baal were the Israelite Pharaohs Ramses XI., XII., XIII.; and the David, the Solomon and the Rehoboam were the Hebrew Pharaohs Hirhor, Piankhi and Pinotem." Life is too short to follow such pedantic midsummer madness beyond the introduction. [London: Chapman & Hall. Limited. $2.00.]

Reprints are numerous. We notice Stepping Heavenward, by Mrs. E. Prentiss, a new edition with appreciative sketch by Professor Prentiss, which will interest all readers of the book. [A. D. F. Randolph & Co. 50 cents.]——Cooper's Spy, in the elegant Mohawk edition—a most satisfactory example of bookmaking. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1 25.]——The Last of the Mohicans, The House of Seven Gables and Robinson Crusoe, in the tasteful Riverside Literature Series, each with an introductory sketch and the last with a useful map of Crusoe's travels. We like these well-printed and neatly bound books very much. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Each 60 cents.] To the same series belongs Gulliver's Travels, with introductory sketch and two maps. [40 cents.]——Irving's Sketch Book, edited by James Chalmers, LL. D. This is intended for school reading and study and is well prepared with introduction, notes and appendices. The introduction is a shade too discursive, but the book serves its purpose satisfactorily. [Silver, Burdett & Co.]——The Uncommercial Traveller and A Child's History of England and Reprinted Pieces and The Two Idle Apprentices, by Dickens, with notes by Charles Dickens the younger. This is a good edition at a reasonable price. [Macmillan & Co. Each $1.00.]——In the Students' Series of English Classics comes The Princess, by Tennyson, Evangeline, by Longfellow, and Pope's Iliad, Books I., VI., XXII. and XXIV. Notes and introductions serve to make these well and simply bound books available for school use. [Leach, Shewell & Sanborn. Each 35 cents.]——In Maynard's English Classic Series we have Silas Marner, by George Eliot, and Tales of a Traveller, by Irving. These are well-printed and convenient little books with rather dazzling yellow edges, belonging to an extensive and well-selected series. [Maynard, Merrill & Co. 36 and 24 cents.]

NOTES.

—— The model of the Shaw memorial group for Boston Common is finished at last, but the slow processes of making a mold and casting the bronze will require nearly or quite a year.

—— A correspondent calls our attention to the fact that Vernon Lee, whose Renaissance Fancies and Studies we reviewed three weeks ago, is the pen name of a woman, whose real name is Violet Paget. As predicted, the editor accepts the correction with a smile and thanks to his corrector.

—— The missal or prayer-book said to have been brought by Augustine, the apostle to the Anglo-Saxons, with him when he landed in England has been discovered in the library of one of the colleges of Cambridge University. It has annotations supposed to be by Pope Gregory the Great, and is soon to be reprinted by the discoverer, Mr. Martin Rule.

—— The jubilee of Lord Kelvin, the greatest British man of science, is interesting Glasgow University and scientific circles elsewhere. Lord Kelvin is perhaps better known as Sir William Thompson, and has since the death of Helmholtz been acknowledged as the greatest master of physical knowledge and research. His knighthood came at the time of his success with the Atlantic cable.

—— It is a notable service which Dr. Henry J. Furbur, Jr., of Chicago, in connection with prominent American educators, has rendered both to France and America in inducing the French educational authorities to open the doors of French universities to graduates of American colleges. It may have the effect, perhaps, of turning some part of the stream of students which is always pouring into Germany in another direction.

—— At their meeting Monday afternoon the directors of the Newberry Library of Chicago decided to establish a new department. It is to be known as the military department. Effort will be made to obtain everything of value in print bearing upon the subject of war. It is said that this is the first attempt to gather together in a single department everything pertaining to the science of war. Only those who keep in touch with the Newberry Library have any idea of the value of its present collections or their admirable arrangement for use. Meanwhile, in the very heart of the city, occupying the entire floor of a great commercial building, the managers of the Crerar Library are preparing to throw it open to the public in the autumn.

Dr. Alexander McKenzie of Cambridge is the favorite preacher of the class at Yale which is about to graduate. This is the deliberate verdict of its members in response to questions for their class-book.

ANNIVERSARY WEEK AT ANDOVER.

It is a custom of very long standing that on Sunday the students of Phillips Academy and Andover Seminary shall worship together in the common chapel of the two institutions. Accordingly, when the exercises of anniversary week were begun by Prof. G. F. Moore's baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class of the seminary on the afternoon of June 7, an inspiring audience of young people filled the church. Professor Moore spoke on The Opportunities and the Difficulties of the Christian Ministry, his text being, "A great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries."

On Monday it rained, also on Tuesday, and yet on Wednesday, but that did not hinder the investigations of the visiting committee, who made themselves familiar with the methods of instruction and of study pursued in the seminary.

Having presented statements of orthodox belief, Mr. Ernest Hamlin Abbott, Mr. John Comin, Mr. Rollin L. Hartt and Mr. James Peter King received ordination on Monday evening. All four are to engage in what is actually, or practically, home mission work, Mr. Comin and Mr. King in the Dakotas, Mr. Hartt in Montana, and Mr. Abbott, who is a son of Dr. Lyman Abbott, in Maine, which circumstances account for the readiness of a council to ordain them to the ministry at large. The service was a beautiful one. Dr. Abbott's sermon on the text, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth," was full of encouragement and inspiration. He showed that men have power in the ministry in proportion to their possession of the gospel, and that the only gospel is the gospel of "good news." As the four young men knelt together for the laying on of hands President Smyth offered a prayer that stirred the deepest feelings of every hearer. His faith, his devoutness and his profound spirituality recalled the epithet that Chocarne put upon Lacordaire"—an ancient Christian in a modern man." The right hand of fellowship was given by Rev. George M. Ward, president-elect of Rollins College, and a member of the Senior Class.

Tuesday was occupied with the public examinations of the seminary. These are a survival of antiquity. The professor takes the chair. The visiting board forms a solid phalanx at one side of the rostrum. Ladies, alumni and inquisitive idlers sit along the walls, and the body of the room is occupied by the students under examination, who stand up one at a time to answer questions by the professor and to submit to further questioning by the visitors. To the inexperienced onlooker it would appear that the student was on trial, that the professor was the prosecuting attorney, and that the visitors were the jury. This, however, is not the case. It is the professor that is being tried. The students are called as witnesses to attest his orthodoxy and efficiency, and the visitors are judge, jury and executioners combined.

Professor Torrey's class in Hebrew, Professor Harris's pupils in theology, and President Smyth's class in church history passed muster on Tuesday morning and afternoon. Tuesday evening Rev. Amory H. Bradford addressed the Society of Inquiry on Christ in the Creeds, showing how Christianity was at first a man, then a fact, and that then followed a series of theories about the fact, each more complicated than the one before it, until the emphasis came to be put, not upon ethics, not upon life, but rather upon the acceptance of metaphysical systems of theology. He closed with an appeal for a creed that should embody the golden rule and the brotherhood of man, and said that Mrs. Ward's A Singular Life would give a Buddhist or a Confucian a truer conception of Christ than the Westminster Confession. The first exercise of Wednesday was a performance by Professor Churchill's class in elocution. A large crowd of visitors were present and gave every evidence of interest.

Two examinations—one of Professor Ryder's class in Greek and the other of Professor Hincks's class in Biblical theology—filled Wednesday morning, the afternoon being given to a meeting of the alumni. This was an unusually interesting occasion, the subject for discussion being The Future of Foreign Missions. Dr. Bradford spoke on Problems before the Churches in Japan and paid a beautiful tribute to Rev. Sidney Gulick, who was present in the audience. After an address by Rev. W. A. Farnsworth, D. D., on The Forward Movement in Turkish Missions, Dr. Abbott spoke with his usual impressiveness on Today's Problems in Foreign Missions. Rev. Daniel Bliss, D. D., of Beirut was the next speaker, and the meeting closed with remarks by Mr. Gulick. The "theological tea-party" was given Wednesday evening.

Thursday was Commencement day. The procession of trustees, faculty, alumni and students marched into the church at 10.30. The graduating class numbered fifteen—E. H. Abbott, A. S. Burrill, J. M. Blue, A. Campbell, J. Comin, J. A. Goodrich, R. L. Hartt, J. P. King, R. A. MacFadden, J. P. Manwell, H. G. Megathlin, J. H. Olmstead, A. Truslow, H. H. Walker and G. M. Ward.

After music and prayer five short addresses were presented by members of the graduating class. A sixth speaker would have been Mr. Olmstead, who, on account of illness, was unable to be present. The orations were remarkable for the authority with which the students presented the themes they had chosen. Mr. Ward, who has practiced law, discussed The Influence of the Pentateuch upon American Law; Mr. Abbott, who has published several musical compositions, treated of church music under the title of Cantate Domino; Mr. King, by virtue of two years of foreign study on the Princeton Fellowship in philosophy, was well fitted to give a philosophical development to his subject, Belief and Life; Mr. Walker, who told the story of Perpetua, is to go to Germany on the Winckley Fellowship to pursue a further course of study in church history; and Mr. MacFadden, acting pastor during the last year at the West Church in Andover, spoke on The Preacher in an Age of Criticism. After the singing by the graduating class of Dr. Washington Gladden's hymn, "O, Master, let me walk with thee," prayer was offered by Dr. Abbott.

The inauguration of Rev. Prof. John Wesley Churchill as Bartlet professor of sacred rhetoric followed immediately. Rev. D. T. Fiske, D. D., president of the board of trustees, took the chair. Professor Harris read the fourth chapter of Ephesians, and then the ancient creed of the seminary was solemnly read and as solemnly signed by Professor Churchill.

After the service the alumni dinner was served in Bartlet Chapel. Several striking and impressive speeches followed, the most notable one being that of Professor Smyth, who took the opportunity to announce his resignation from the office of president of the faculty and the election of Professor Harris to succeed him.

The year has been one of unusual prosperity. The long vacant chair of homiletics is at last satisfactorily filled, and the temporary services of Professor English and Dr. McKenzie were duly appreciated. The spiritual life of the institution has been sound and deep, and there is little trace left of the alleged Unitarian spirit that called out so much criticism three years ago. Of the four men who were ordained and the many who were licensed at the close of the year not one gave evidence of heterodox opinion. Then, too, the missionary spirit is unusually strong. A mass meeting recently petitioned the faculty to provide a course of instruction in the history of missions. The outlook for the coming year is thoroughly encouraging. H.

PASSING COMMENT.

One will not need to be a professional organist to appreciate the worth of the instrument pictured and described in another column.

The hearty indorsement of that men's organization by a certain Congregational club seems to be appropriate to the fine reputation which its work has already won for it.

As the matter has developed it is well that our St. Paul church escaped a union with a certain church of another denomination in that city, unless we could have been sure of more sincerity from the latter as a Congregational body than under its present name.

To a noble cause the Vermont churches largely ascribed their fine record of benevolences at their late annual meeting.

Although the subject of that paper recently given at a Monday Club on the Pacific coast does not imply the general attitude of the strong toward the weak, the theme was timely just now as vacations take many working members of the churches into new fields of labor temporarily

Readers who remember the destructive fire which robbed a western Massachusetts church of its venerable old meeting house over a year ago will be glad to congratulate the people on their successful replacement of that ancient landmark.

It will pay us to take a flying trip in our reading to Washington State to note how a church there pays its debts and makes good its claim to a right to exist.

A New England Y. W. C. A. has developed a "fresh air" idea which deserves full patronage. Many weary workers are thus offered an opportunity of which they would otherwise be deprived on account of too great expense.

ANNIVERSARY AT HARTFORD SEMINARY.

The sixty-second anniversary at Hartford began Tuesday, June 2, with the annual address before the Pastoral Union and Alumni Association by Rev. W. R. Richards, D. D., of Plainfield, N. J., on the theme The City and Its Church. He showed the desirability of following the early church for effective Christian work, considering each city or town a unit and organizing work on that basis. We should be able to speak of "the church of New York city," and not merely of "the churches." While the ideal may not yet be attainable, at least the churches of each denomination in a town or city may work towards this end.

Wednesday morning was devoted to oral examinations for the three classes. President Hartranft led the prayer meeting which followed. After this came the anniversary dinner. President Hartranft gave an encouraging report of the work of the year. Dr. A. C. Thompson, the oldest living graduate, spoke for the trustees, and there were short addresses by Dr. Richards, Professor Perry, Rev. G. R. Hewitt, '86, Mr. J E. Merrill of the Graduating Class and Dr. Lyman Whiting.

At the annual meeting of the Alumni Association, Wednesday afternoon, the necrology was read. Among the graduates who have died during the year are Dr. Josiah Tyler, '48, the revered missionary to Zululand; Rev. F. J. Perkins, '91, a missionary to Brazil; and Nahabed Abdalian, M. D., '77, a victim of the Armenian massacres. Then President Hartranft, Rev. F. S. Hatch and Rev. Asher Anderson, D. D., discussed The Relation of the Theological Seminaries to the Congregational Churches. They pleaded for a closer and more vital connection between seminary and church.

The graduating exercises were held Wednesday evening. Dr. C. M. Lamson conducted the devotional exercises. The addresses by members of the Graduating Class were as follows: Harry S. Dunning on The Proper Emphasis of the Individual; Edward P. Kelly on The Military Idea in Religion; Miss Laura H. Wild on The Mystic's Point of View in Present Day Living; and John E. Merrill on The Hunger for Reality. After the announcement of degrees and prizes and the presentation of diplomas to the ten members of the Graduating Class, President Hartranft spoke the parting word to the graduates. He emphasized the need of an exalted conception of Christ as perfect God and perfect man as a condition for fruitful work in the ministry. The annual meetings of the board of trustees and the Pastoral Union were held Thursday morning.

A MARVELOUS MODERN ORGAN.

The recent introduction of a magnificent new instrument into the meeting house of the South Church, New Britain, Ct., gives to that city the largest organ in Connecticut and, with one exception, the largest in New England. It is beyond doubt one of the most perfect in the country, both mechanically and musically, and marks a distinct advance in the history of organ-building in America. To quote the words of an impartial expert who recently examined it, "It is the embodiment of the most advanced organ-building in the world today."

Here is a notable example of the progress in the manufacture of church organs incident to the use of electricity. The entire action is the result of the development of a new principle in the application of electricity. It reduces the movable parts to the lowest limit—a single contact in the key desk for each key, there being no contacts within the organ. The amount of current required is three amperes under a pressure of four volts. With the contact made by a depression of the key a circuit is completed, and by means of a small insulated wire running from the key desk a magnet inside the organ operates the pneumatic motors supplying the wind. The same principle holds good in regard to the stop action, combination action and also to the swell shades. The novelty and originality of the principle has astonished experts.

The console, or key desk, shown at the lower left-hand corner of the cut, is the only one of the kind now in existence. It is portable, connected with the organ by a flexible cable 100 feet in length, and is a marvel of compactness and simplicity. It weighs less than 300 pounds and is but four feet high, four long and two and one-half wide. The stops are placed upon doors, which swing out to a convenient angle for operation, and when not in use they are placed as receivers for the roll top, which incloses the stops and keyboard. The pedal keys are on a pivoted frame and can be folded up for convenience in moving The connecting cable contains 400 wires and is almost instantaneously detachable from the desk.

Particular attention will be directed to the voicing of the instrument, which is as beautiful and unusual as the action is unique and complete. The single aim has been to produce a musical organ, and to that end neither pains nor expense have been spared. Many organs are forced in order to "fill the church." Owing to its comprehensive scheme this organ makes forcing entirely unnecessary. The full organ effect, therefore, is dignified, massive and brilliant, yet without harshness.

The brilliancy of the organ is secured by a generous use of reeds—no less than sixteen stops of reeds—while the screaming mixtures often predominant have been subordinated. The string stops are seldom equaled in any organ and give the impression of a large body of strings in an orchestra. In the fundamental tone there is no lack, it being full and mellow and strongly suggestive of the celebrated English diapasons. The effects produced by the softer combinations are simply wonderful. The tone seems to come from no particular place, but pervades the entire church, and has the peculiar floating quality of music heard in large cathedrals.

The pedal organ is unusually large and complete, taking in the entire range of pedal resources. It is said to be the finest pedal organ in America. The flexible cable makes it possible to play the organ from any part of the church. The length of wiring is about twenty-five miles. The storage battery supplying the electrical energy for the entire organ is less than eight inches square and is charged by a standard incandescent current. The action is lighter in touch than that of a grand piano and has a marvelous capacity for repetition, is instantaneously responsive and has met the most crucial tests. The weight of the organ is about thirty-seven tons. It is blown by a water motor. The total cost of the organ is $18,000.

It will be seen, then, that this is a brilliant concert instrument, but more than that it is a church organ, for which, first before all, it was planned and built. Even at a single hearing one cannot fail to be impressed with the wonderful possibilities of the instrument, the variety and uniqueness of orchestral effects which can be produced upon it and, in general, that beautiful, singing, mellow, dignified tone, present alike in each stop and in the full organ, which, for want of a better term, is often appropriately called "churchly."

Splendid as the instrument is it has been provided with a worthy and appropriate exterior, which at once arrests the eye with its richness and elegance, its beautiful symmetry and its ecclesiastical appearance, so appropriate to the place.

The organ is the gift of Hon. Philip Corbin, for twenty-five years a member of the choir of this church, who characteristically and generously gave direction for the production of the best instrument for the place. It is a fitting and enduring monument to his name and liberality.

All, including the donor and builder, have felt under obligation to the organist of the church, Mr. R. P. Paine, who furnished the scheme for the organ and gave helpful suggestions and constant and unflagging attention to every detail of construction and effect.

The powers of the organ were tested a second time, recently, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society. The selections were classical, and the wonderful way in which the organ carried out the player's remarkable interpretation made the recital one of unusual interest. The Philharmonic Society is one of the leading musical organizations of the State.

AFTER THE WHIRLWIND.

St. Louis feels that she has received the most severe blow of any city of modern times. The situation was not at first realized. When the truth dawned the city was for an instant dazed. But she began to take stock of damages, clear away the wreck, bury the dead and provide for the destitute. Now her purse is open and her face is set to the future.

The centers of greatest destruction were Lafayette Park, Seventh and Rutgar Streets, the Levee in the neighborhood of Chouteau Avenue and East St. Louis near the end of the Eads Bridge. But these were only the centers. The path was not narrow but a broad swath. In places the destruction was as though a mighty hand had grasped buildings, trees and poles and ground them into pieces, then dropped them in heaps or scattered them broadcast.

Trees are uprooted and splintered, poles are snapped and wires are mixed in dire confusion. Roofs have been rolled up and blown away, flues are crumbled and walls are in ruins. Great blocks of stone have been lifted out of place, heavy iron girders are twisted and bent, boats have been blown out of the river and some have been sunk. When the approaches and pier of the Eads Bridge gave way, onlookers thought the end of the world was near.

Residences, street railroads, telephone and lighting companies have suffered more than the main business houses. Our Congregational churches escaped with little injury. Immanuel meeting house can be repaired for less than $100, Maplewood and Compton Hill for about $50 each, and the Swedish house for $200. The old wooden bell tower of the People's Tabernacle was blown into the street. The pavement was injured, but the bell remained sound. A brick gable of the Fountain Park Church, which is in process of erection, was blown out and the basement room, which had been finished and was being used for services, was two inches under water. The loss will fall upon the contractors, but $300 will repair the damage.

The families connected with the Maplewood Church suffered losses ranging from $10 to $300. The situation in Harlem Place was much the same, though the losses were more severe. Reber Place Church escaped, but the husband of one of its members was killed in another part of the city. Compton Hill, with a resident membership of 403, had 52 families or 114 members in houses that were damaged. Thirteen families have moved and nine more should follow their example. One family at least had cyclone insurance to the amount of $3,000. However great the losses have been the pastor, Dr. G. C. Adams, states that none of the members are seriously crippled.

The Bohemian congregation has been worshiping in the chapel of a German church. That building was seriously injured, with the result that the Bohemian congregation has relinquished the morning service. The windows of the house of Rev. Edmund Wrbitzky, the pastor, were blown out, but no further damage was done.

DEVASTATION WROUGHT BY THE STORM.

Turning to sister denominations the situation is worse. The Lafayette Park Presbyterian Church sustains damages of $10,000 or $12,000. The pastor's house was blown down and one of his sons injured. The Trinity Lutheran Church will need to construct a new edifice. The Lafayette Park Methodist Episcopal South edifice was damaged to the extent of $10,000, and about ninety per cent. of the membership is in roofless houses. St. Paul's German building was totally destroyed. Compton Heights Christian meeting house was damaged to the amount of $1,500, and the Lafayette Park Baptist Church will require $6,000 to repair their house. The roof of Mt. Calvary Episcopal was lifted and crashed down upon the building, carrying everything with it. Beside this the Church of the Unity, St. John's Episcopal, the Church of the Holy Angels, the First German Presbyterian, St. Vincent's and others were more or less wrecked or destroyed.

The Provident Association, the St. Vincent De Paul Society, the South Broadway Merchants, the Hebrew Association and other bodies are organized in connection with a committee of the Merchants' Exchange, of which Rev. W. W. Boyd, D. D., pastor of the Second Baptist Church, is chairman. Large quantities of new and partly worn clothing and furniture are being collected and distributed. The relief fund is approaching $200,000. Private charity is also doing large and effective work. The heart of the city has been thoroughly moved. The churches are earnestly engaged. Lafayette Park meeting house, wrecked as it is, is a center of distribution. Many of our Congregational women, especially those of Pilgrim Church, are actively engaged.

The season for outings is upon us, but picnics have been given up. Pilgrim Church has paid its picnic fund into the relief treasury. The city schools are suspending their picnics, where possible, and the money is going for the same purpose. St. Louis has felt that she could meet the emergency herself. Yet there is a strong feeling, perhaps the feeling of a majority of the people, expressed by a mass meeting in South St. Louis and by the Congregational Ministers' Meeting, that aid should not only be received from all quarters but encouraged within and without. The local self-respect and independence is splendid, and it will not be injured by the receipt of gifts from the outside world. Contributions from Chicago, Philadelphia, New York and other cities are already acknowledged.

A movement is also on foot to establish the Emergency Relief Association of St. Louis, the object being to provide a fund from which loans may be made to persons unable to build or repair their houses. Second deeds of trust are to be taken. No commissions will be charged and no interest for the first three months. After that time interest will be charged at the rate of four per cent. Arrangements are to be made for the payment of interest and principal monthly and subscribers will receive back the principal in monthly dividends and ultimately the interest. It is estimated that $500,000 will be required. No doubt is felt but that it will be secured, for $75,000 was pledged at once.

The loss of life has not been so great as at first supposed. At present it seems that in St. Louis and East St. Louis together it will not exceed, and probably will fall below, 300. How much property has been destroyed is still and, for a time, must remain, a question. Estimates range from $10,000,000 to $50,000,000.

The directors of the City Missionary Society have estimated that the loss of property to the churches under their care is about $1,000, so that the society is having a sharp struggle to meet its expenses. The St. Louis churches, in their efforts to erect new buildings, maintain the city missionary work and meet various other demands, have been under a strain, and in some quarters the care of their own sufferers is now added and in others men who have not been seriously crippled have lost for a time their power to give. In general, the churches have taxed themselves to raise money and secure food, clothing and furniture for the victims of the storm. The directors feel that the work of repair will fall upon the society and they will welcome contributions for that purpose from friends both East and West. Checks may be sent to Lewis E. Snow, treasurer, 111 North Third Street, St. Louis.

A careful canvass is now being made to find those who need help and cannot bring themselves to ask for it. Money is still coming to the relief treasury. The fund stood, June 12, at $231,284 and East St. Louis fund at $43,810. Some of the relief stations have been closed, but loads of clothing and furniture are being gathered and sent to headquarters or direct to families who are in need. J. P. O.

THE VERMONT GENERAL CONVENTION.

Among the lovely spots on earth must be reckoned the villages among the Vermont hills in early June. Bradford, with its one, wide, wandering street, bordered by maples, the air perfumed by the honey-locust, its costly library and public school buildings, the gift of Mr. Woods, its pleasant homes and open-hearted people was worthy of the State and the occasion, June 9–11, when Vermont Congregationalists met for their 101st annual meeting.

The president, Rev. E. T. Fairbanks, launched the sessions on a high level at the opening service, showing that while only a few of the meetings were specifically prayer meetings, the spirit of prayer would pervade each hour.

The convention sermon by Rev. V. M. Hardy of Randolph was a strong and uplifting presentation of The Principles of Self-Abnegating Service, based on Luke 22: 27. He found illustrations of the principle in nature, in the thinking of the worlds, in the working of God. The communion service was conducted by Rev. Messrs. J. K. Williams of Peacham and S. N. Jackson of Barre. An innovation this year was an early morning prayer meeting at six o'clock. The attendance was not large but those who made their way thither through the pouring rain were well repaid.

The first hour of Wednesday's session was given to the report of the churches through Principal J. M. Comstock of Chelsea, who has the gift of making dry statistics blossom like the rose. The number of churches is 204, one having been added during the year, a Swedish church at Brattleboro. The church members number 21,553, the largest in fifty years, the number of removals being noticeably less. The number of families is 16,330, the largest number ever reported in connection with our churches. More remarkable still in this year of financial depression, the benevolences reached the highest point yet attained, $58,697, much of this being on account of the General Howard Roll of Honor.

The Domestic Missionary Society reported a year of aggressive work and no debt. For home missions $25,000 were raised, of which $9,400 were used in the State. Persistent toil in discouraging fields is bearing fruit. Danby with six members has added forty-five. Vershire has added thirty-one, more than doubling its membership. Two fields, where union houses of worship had been abandoned by other denominations, have been entered by our young women evangelists. Sunday schools and Endeavor Societies have been formed and in one place the people desire to form a church with one of the young women as pastor. Fifteen young women have been employed at different times during the year and their work has been fruitful.

Wednesday afternoon the convention listened to a scholarly statement of Essential Christian Doctrines by Dr. A. H. Heath of St. Johnsbury. A discussion of Practical Christian Citizenship followed, with papers by Messrs. W. B. Howe of Burlington, representing the press, F. W. Baldwin of Barton, representing the bar, N. G. Williams of Bellows Falls, representing manufacturing interests, treating the Creation of Public Sentiment, The Enactment and The Enforcement of Law. Missions formed the subject for Wednesday evening, with addresses by Rev. Messrs. M. L. Severance, H. L. Bailey and Dr. E. B. Webb.

The question of a home for aged ministers came before the convention, and a committee of five laymen was appointed to consider the offer of a valuable property in Burlington for that purpose. The committee on The Vermont Chronicle reported a change in form, reduction in price, the introduction of new departments and a purpose to make the paper more than ever in its seventy-one years of history an exponent of the life of our churches. Rev. Frank F. Lewis is to have editorial supervision.

The Woman's Home Missionary Union held its sessions on Tuesday. Addresses were given by Misses Mitchell and Emerson, Rev. R. A. Rowley and Mrs. Ida Woodbury. Mrs. W. J. Van Patten is the new president.

N. Y.—The annual meeting of the Black River and St. Lawrence Association occurred at Massena June 9, 10. A great rain reduced the attendance, but the interest was excellent. Rev. G. F. Chipperfield of Malone delivered a rare semon. The addresses were, The Christian Message in Ian Maclaren's Literary Works, The Country Church, The Old and New Woman, The Armenian Missionary Work and Present Distress and The A. M. A. Cause.

D. C.—The Washington Conference met in Herndon, Va., June 9. Eleven churches were represented. Reports showed additions to all during the last quarter, while two churches during the past year have become self-supporting and three have begun building. The topics were: What Is Encouraging in the Reports, What Is Humiliating, Causes for Gratitude, The Bible Club for Regular Sabbath School Teachers, The Normal Class for Substitute and Prospective Teachers, The Desirability of the Mammoth Annual Conventions of Christian Endeavor.

MINN.—Western Conference met at Sleepy Eye, June 9, 10. The conference is the smallest in the State. Several of the churches were without pastors, so that the attendance of ministers was small. It was an excellent meeting, however, the topics being: The Sunday School as an Evangelizing Agency, Conditions of Entrance into the Church, Do Missions Pay? Missionary Work in the South, Sunday School Work and National Evangelization. Rev. G. M. Morrison preached the sermon. The propriety of uniting with a neighboring conference was decided in the negative.

NEB.—The Columbus Association, which was the last one in the series of local associations for the State, held its annual session in Albion, June 2–4. The pastor, Rev. L. H. Stoughton, had interested his people in the meeting and the local attendance was good. An address on Congregationalism was given by Rev. A. J. Rogers. Church Organization, Teaching the Principles of Congregationalism, Uniting With Others in Moral Reform Efforts, The Prayer Meeting, Sunday School Work and Christian Education were topics happily presented. Gates College and Home Missions were on the program. During the woman's hour Foreign and Home Work were represented. The reports of the churches showed progress, and only two are pastorless.

CLUBS.

MASS.—The Worcester Club held its 20th annual festival, June 8, with one of the largest gatherings in its history. Dr. Archibald McCullagh presided, and in accordance with the custom at the June meeting representatives of the other denominations were among the invited guests. Dr. Arthur Little gave an address on The Leadership for the Hour, and Dr. A. H. Bradford of Montclair, N. J., on The Latest from Japan. Music was furnished by a male quartet from Boston.

CAL.—The San Francisco Club held the second meeting of the year with the church in Alameda, Rev. W. W. Scudder, pastor. About 70 persons were present. Several 10 minute speeches were made on the general theme, The Work of Men in Our Churches. Resolutions were passed heartily indorsing the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip as an organization especially adapted for men's work among men.

NEW ENGLAND.

Massachusetts.

CHELSEA.—Central. The Visitor this month notes the fact that this year will be memorable for the wiping out of the entire indebtedness of the church, a result which was never before accomplished here. The last payment on a long-standing mortgage is provided for. A friend generously offered to pay one-quarter of the indebtedness and the same proportion of any sum which might be raised for needed repairs. The debt amounted to $5,500. The church rejoices in the prospect of burning the mortgage.

ROWLEY.—First receives from David E. Smith, a prominent townsman, a $2,000 organ, to be known as the Smith memorial organ. The donor has also arranged to build a public library for the town, additional to various other public gifts.

SHIRLEY.—The 14 persons received to membership June 7, 12 on confession, are the largest accession which ever occurred at one time in the history of the church. Rev. Joseph Torrey is pastor.

WORCESTER.—Bethany has voted its pastor, Rev. A. G. Todd, two weeks' additional vacation, and the C. E. Society has presented him with a sum of money to help make it more profitable.——The Y. W. C. A. opened its summer home at Princeton last week. Dr. Archibald McCullagh and Rev. C. A. White were speakers and over 100 persons attended. The home is situated at the base of Wachusett Mountain, will accommodate 25 persons and is the gift of E. A. Goodnow. Through July and August it will be open to any business or working woman, and is not restricted to members. The terms are $3 per week.

SPRINGFIELD.—Children's Day was generally observed in the churches of the city last Sunday.——Hope followed its usual custom of presenting covenant Bibles to children baptized in the church in infancy who have reached the age of seven years. There were four recipients. The evening was devoted to Sunday school exercises. This church has one of the most perfectly graded schools in this vicinity. The departments range from primary to normal, each year graduation exercises are held and in the upper grades diplomas are given. B. L. Bragg, the superintendent, is an enthusiast in Sunday school work, although one of the busiest of the business men of the city.——Olivet celebrates the anniversary of the formation of its Sunday school every Children's Day. This year was the 63d observance. The whole day was given over to the school.——North observed the 119th anniversary of the adoption of the American flag as the national emblem in connection with its children's exercises. Dept. Commander W. P. Derby of the Grand Army made the address of the occasion. Rev. Samuel Freuder, formerly a Jewish rabbi but now a Congregational minister, gave an interesting talk last week at the prayer meeting on The Hebrews of Today, showing articles used in the Jewish synagogues.——Eastern Avenue Sunday school promoted two classes from the primary to the intermediate department, each scholar receiving a certificate signed by the pastor, superintendent and primary superintendent.——First held anniversary exercises at the regular Sunday school hour and devoted the evening to a Children's Day concert. The meetings are still held in Court Square Theater.——St. John's furnished quite an elaborate program of music, recitations and remarks.——South gave up the usual vesper service to the children, and the primary pupils had a prominent part in the exercises. Dr. P. S. Moxom preached to the little folks in the morning.

WEST SPRINGFIELD.—Park Street has finally settled the difficulty concerning the calling of a pastor. The two parties have agreed to hire Rev. A. E. Fitch of Utica, N. Y., to perform pastoral duties for one year, at the end of which time, if agreeable, a call will be extended. A subscription paper now in circulation has about $1,900 pledged toward the expenses of the church.

PEBU.—The new church edifice on Peru Hill, which has been erected on the site of the old meeting house destroyed by fire over a year ago, was formally dedicated June 10 The services were in charge of Rev. E. L. Clark of Hinsdale, who for several years has been acting pastor of the church. The structure is 60 x 50 feet in dimension, seating 300 persons and cost $4,000, all of which has been paid, leaving $20 in the treasury. A fine communion service and table vase were presented by the Frissell brothers of Hinsdale in memory of their father and mother. The organ, bell, pulpit and furniture were also donated. Greetings were given by Rev. G. W. Adams of Dalton. Rev. Dr. W. V. W. Davis of Pittsfield preached the dedicatory sermon. The church is now entirely free from debt.

Maine.

WATERVILLE.—The Maine Branch W. B. M. held its 23d annual meeting June 11. The program consisted of addresses, reports and the topics: The Best Method to Advance the Work in Country Churches, Missionary Literature, The Need for Junior Work in Maine. There was a question box and a parliamentary drill. In the evening addresses were made by Miss Charlotte P. Sibley and Miss Kate G. Lamson.

WARREN.—Rev. E. R. Stearns has closed his labors at New Vineyard and begins work here this month. This change, with the recent departure of Rev. W. W. Rauney from Phillips to Park Church, Hartford, Ct., leaves but one of the five original members of the Andover Band with the churches to which these young men went four years ago.

FALMOUTH.—The house of worship of this church, which hospitably entertained the local conference recently, has been renovated at an expense of $1,200, being reseated, redecorated and furnished with stained glass windows. The pastor, Rev. W. H. Haskell, has served the church faithfully for 27 years.

PORTLAND.—High Street. The officers of the church have requested Dr. W. H. Fenn to permit the public celebration of the 30th anniversary of his pastorate July 5, and announcements to that effect have been published in the city papers. With one exception this is now the longest pastorate in the State.

GORHAM.—The erection of a commodious parish house is contemplated immediately. Of the $3,000 or $10,000 needed $6,500 are already pledged. The church is happy and harmonious under the strong leadership of Rev. G. W. Reynolds.

BANGOR.—Deacon E. F. Duren, although retiring, on account of failing eyesight, from active service in the office which he has held so long, will still be a member of the deacons' board.

BINGHAM.—Rev. J. C. Gregory has accomplished efficient work here, one result being seen in the fine building, more centrally located and recently dedicated.

New Hampshire.

BERLIN.—The pastor, Rev. J. B. Caruthers, has been supplementing his home labors by a missionary trip into the Magalloway country, Errol and Wilson's Mills, to render assistance and encouragement to the regular missionary laboring among the woodsmen.

BARNSTEAD.—In connection with the meeting of the Merrimack County Conference the centennial of this church was observed. Dr. John Wheeler gave the historical address, and Mrs. M. H. Wheeler was poetess. Other speakers participated.

SWANZEY.—Thieves lately broke into the chapel and carried away whatever silverware and table linen they could find. Fortunately the communion service, stored in the main building, escaped notice and was saved.

MOUNT VERNON.—During the recent season the pastor, Rev. T. J. Lewis, gave a series of interesting and instructive lectures on the Lord's Prayer, also several talks before the C. E. Society which were pertinent and helpful.

WARNER.—The new pastor, Rev. A. H. Armes, is at work. He recently preached an acceptable sermon before the graduates of the high school. There is increasing interest in all public services and everything looks hopeful.

The sum of $100 was recently netted by a birthday party at the parsonage of Franklin Street Church, Manchester.——The Newport church has been wired for electric lighting by nearly 100 incandescent lamps.

Vermont.

MIDDLETOWN SPRINGS.—At the fifth anniversary of Rev. H. L. Bailey's pastorate, a review of the work showed the membership had held its own. There have been 16 additions.

ST. ALBANS.—First. At the annual meeting the receipts of the year were reported as $3,813 and the expenses $3,742. A larger amount was recommended for next year.

NORTH BENNINGTON.—Last year 10 new members were received, making the present roll 90. The annual meeting was an occasion of many encouraging responses.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

OWEGO.—The church here is again rejoicing in the addition at the communion service, June 7, of five adult members, four on confession. Of these three were mothers. The day was one of rejoicing for the pastor, Rev. C. M. Bartholomew, and the people. The preparatory service on the Thursday preceding communion was more largely attended than any similar service during the present pastorate.

New Jersey.

ASBURY PARK.—The supporters of Rev. H. T. Widdemer, formerly Presbyterian, have severed their former church connections and become Congregationalists. At the decisive meeting Rev. R. J. Kent of the Lewis Avenue Church presided and explained the doctrines and forms to the new body. The charter members of the church, numbering 144, adopted the creed of 1883, and Mr. Widdemer was elected pastor. Thirty-one other members united by letter and five on confession. The body was formerly the First Presbyterian Church, which after a year of disagreement with Monmouth Presbytery preferred to dissolve its relations with the denomination.

CLOSTER.—The "Do Something Band," before adjourning for the summer, held a sale in the pastor's house at which about $25 were realized for the benefit of the missions in Eastern Turkey. Chinese lanterns and flags were conspicuous in the decorations.

CHATHAM.—The pastor, Rev. W. F. Cooley, has just been pleasantly surprised by his people with the gift of a new bicycle. The Sunday school is held in the morning for the summer and the evening service is resumed.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

MANSFIELD.—First. The death of the late pastor, Dr. J. W. Hubbell, has been keenly felt by the church, and sympathy for Mrs. Hubbell is expressed in the recent action of the trustees and deacons continuing the regular salary until Nov. 1 and the use of the parsonage until it is needed. At a recent memorial service interesting facts concerning the nine and a half years' pastorate of Dr. Hubbell were brought out, and warm tributes were paid him.

Illinois.

GALESBURG.—Knox Street. Owing to the indefatigable labor of the pastor, Rev. Arthur Miles, together with the valuable service rendered by Evangelists VanAuken and Bursk, who spent three weeks upon this field, the church has nearly tripled its membership during the last six months. Members have been received on each of the last five Sundays and others have applied for membership. The people have gone to work to wipe out the indebtedness, which has been something of a hindrance, and all are hopeful of soon being upon a sound financial footing and of constant growth numerically and spiritually. Mr. Miles made 200 calls during the three months ending May 31.

CRETE.—The affairs of this church are in better condition than they have been before for many years. The pastor, Rev. W. E. Dawson, and wife, are putting forth strong, faithful effort, and the people are appreciative and responsive.

Indiana.

The latest publication of the State minutes is a creditable record of the jubilee celebration of the convention held in Michigan City last month. There is a historical summary and detailed reports, and the special headings, Jubilee Celebration, The Inner History of the Convention, Early Congregationalism in the West, Reminiscences, are titles of articles which contain interesting and valuable material.

Michigan.

LANSING.—Mayflower Sunday school mission has united with the churches at Delta and Millett in securing the services of Mr. S. B. Chase, recently Y. M. C. A. secretary at Menominee, as pastor and has thus for the first time enjoyed pastoral service. The field is a large and needy one and is fortunate in securing the services of one who has had experience in work of kindred character.

EDMORE.—The church has undertaken the complete renovation of its building, notwithstanding the severe stringency incident to the low price for their staple product, the potato. The church and that of Six Lakes, with which it is yoked, has had marked prosperity under the leadership of Rev. G. W. Riggs.

COPEMISH.—The church has accomplished the moving of its edifice from the top of an eminence outside of the village to a sightly location in the heart of the town. The removal accomplishes the pre-emption of the ground and gives the church new courage in the prosecution of its work.

ALLEGAN.—At the close of this month the pastor, Dr. M. M. Martin, will have completed a pastorate of six years. Great strength has been added to the church and all its departments during this time. He and his wife are planning to take a three months' trip abroad.

DURAND.—Preliminary steps have been taken for the organization of a church at this growing railroad center in the central part of the State.

The church at Lake Odessa has provided for $500 of the indebtedness on their church building.——The recently organized church at Conklin is planning to erect a house of worship during the summer.

Wisconsin.

MILWAUKEE.—The churches have suffered in attendance from the strike during the last six weeks. The strike is now over, but is not declared off. A few antiquated busses are still running and the boycott still considerably affects business. Rev. G. H. Ide and Dr. Judson Titsworth have preached earnest sermons to the strikers, counseling moderation and condemning the boycott.——Plymouth and Grand Avenue churches will hold union services during July and August, the former being closed in July, and the latter in August. Dr. Titsworth has not entirely recovered from his illness and will spend July with his family on the Brule River in the woods of Douglass Co.——Pilgrim dedicated its basement June 11, with a banquet, music, exercises by the children and speeches by the city pastors. The work of excavating and transforming the cellar into a beautiful hall was done by the Boys' Brigade, which will use the room for drilling.

BELOIT.—Sec. J. E. Roy conducted a successful A. M. A. Field Day with the two Congregational churches, June 7. He was accompanied by Rev. Messrs. W. G. Olinger of Kentucky, Spencer Snell of Alabama and Miss Dora B. Dodge of South Dakota.——Second. Thirty members were received June 7—the largest accession upon confession with one exception in the history of the church.

WAUKESHA.—Rev. J. A Blaisdell has closed a successful pastorate of four years and has begun labor in his new field in Olivet, Mich. Rev. C. W. Camp, a former pastor, will supply for the present.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

AURORA.—At the first communion with this church eight persons were received to membership. Improvements have been made on the property, and a noticeable increase of attendance and interest is seen in the services.

Iowa.

BUFFALO CENTER.—Evangelist N. L. Packard is acting pastor at this point, and with the help of Evangelist Cordner a great work has been done. Although this is a new town of less than 800 persons, about 150 have given evidence of conversion, most of the leading business men being among the number. The church has been weak but will now have new strength. The membership of 15 will probably be nearly quadrupled. The town has never been so stirred as at this time. Mr. Cordner has the power of reaching men and setting Christians to work.

CHEROKEE.—Union evangelistic meetings have been held here for the past three weeks under the lead of M. B. Williams. They have been of spiritual power, resulting in about 400 conversions thus far. Mr. Williams was assisted by Charles Alexander, a singer, and laterally by Billy Sunday of baseball fame. The churches have received a spiritual impulse, and young men and women, as well as heads of families, have come to Christ.

CHARLES CITY.—This church has organized a Boys' Brigade, which, with the company at Nashua, forms the First Battalion of Third Iowa Regiment, with Dr. H. C. Scotford as colonel. Rev. C. C. Otis is president of his company and is doing good work for his church.

BLAIRSBURG.—This five-year-old church of 97 members is the only one in a thriving railway village. The congregations and Sunday school so crowd the building that a new house of worship has become a necessity. The initial steps will be taken at once. Rev. A. W. Moore is pastor.

ALGONA.—Rev. C. E. Sinclair received 53 members into the church May 31, 37 of them coming as the result of special meetings conducted by Evangelist Cordner. Others will be added later.

Minnesota.

ST. PAUL.—Pacific. The proposition to unite with the Arlington Hill Presbyterian Church has fallen through. The suggestion came from that church to unite upon a Congregational basis. Pacific accepted the offer, raised the money necessary to move the building according to terms of agreement, upon which the Presbyterian church declined to carry out the agreement, having used the proposed union as a leverage for obtaining money from the Presbyterians for the erection of a new house of worship which is desired. Pacific Church will go on its way and do its work faithfully and effectively as it has done in the past.

FARIBAULT.—First. The 40th anniversary of the organization of the church occurred May 31. The house was beautifully decorated, music was furnished by an old settlers' choir and the pastor, Rev. G. S. Ricker, preached on Forty Years of Progress. The church has one member over 90, another over 87, two over 80 and nearly a score over 70. More than 1,000 persons have been members of the church, and the present membership is 362. The 40th anniversary of the Sunday school was observed June 7, with the principal address by Hon. R. A. Mott, who has been superintendent the larger part of the time.

ORTONVILLE.—The Sunday school has grown since the coming of Pastor G. W. Shaw; and congregations have been good. Old debts are being paid; a new parsonage built, and the next step will be to erect a suitable house of worship, present accommodations being too small.

SLEEPY EYE.—Rev. William Blackwell has completed a pastorate of four years, and the church will not listen to the suggestion of any change. The church building has been enlarged and renovated, and the membership and congregations have increased.

NEW ULM.—The church is pastorless while an old debt is being paid, but was supplied June 7 by Rev. William Oehler of People's Church (German), St. Paul. It is hoped that a minister will be secured in the near future.

Kansas.

FREDONIA.—A ministerial retreat was held June 9-11, conducted by Evangelist Veazie, at which the central theme was The Work of the Kingdom, considered under the heads: Its Pentecost, Scope, Consummation, Organization, Devotion.

Nebraska.

CHADRON.—The church made the month of May a period of personal work. At the first prayer meeting in June interesting and encouraging reports were made, and the church voted to make the prayer meeting a special feature for the month of June. The pastor, Rev. A. E. Ricker, has succeeded in reviving the work at Flag Butte, a country appointment 10 miles distant. That church now has a membership of 17.

LINCOLN.—Vine Street. Rev. A. F. Newell started June 1 on a two months' vacation, which will include bicycle tours through England and Scotland and a visit to the continent. His pulpit will be supplied during June by Rev. A. V. House of New Salem, Mass., a graduate of Doane College, who will visit his mother at Crete.

PALISADE.—The new organ is of great assistance in the public service and is highly appreciated. The pastor, Rev. T. C. Moffatt, continues his work at Hayes Center, also with the Hayes County First Church, which now holds its services at the Koontz schoolhouse, three miles west of the place formerly occupied.

HOWELLS.—The church has renovated and painted its house of worship. There is increasing interest in the Sunday school and in the other departments of work.

Utah.

SALT LAKE CITY.—Phillips. Rev. D. W. Bartlett's resignation took effect June 1. He and his family departed the last of April for their new home in Los Angeles, Cal.—First. Rev. C. T. Brown, together with his family, is taking a rest of two months in the East. Dr. Holman of Minneapolis is supplying the church acceptably.—Rev. W. S. Hawkes, superintendent of home missions, and his family have gone to New England to spend three months, seeking rest and strength.

PROVO.—Rev. Mr. Mead has purchased a covered wagon and makes good use of it in the cause of the church. At the time of the recent C. E. Convention he drove to Salt Lake with a load of young people.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

SAN FRANCISCO.—A Missionary Dream was a recent subject at the Monday Club. Rev. W. P. Hardy, in opening the discussion, emphasized the importance of the strong helping the weak—the larger churches serving the smaller, not only in gifts but in practical service.

DECOTO.—Until recently this was the only town in Alameda County without a church edifice. Through the indefatigable labors of Rev. F. H. Maar of Niles a neat little building is now approaching completion. Several C. E. Societies are extending a helping hand.

SACRAMENTO.—So successful have been the labors of Dr. and Mrs. Hoyt in their year and a half here that the building of a new edifice is under discussion.

Mrs. Mary E. Logan, a missionary on Ruk, one of the Caroline Islands, for many years, is about to return for future labors, though it was there that she lost her husband. She soon sails for Honolulu, to sail thence on the Morning Star.

Washington.

SNOHOMISH.—This church, Rev. W. C. Merritt, pastor, held its sixth anniversary June 4. It was expected that at this birthday occasion an effort would be made to extinguish the debt to the C. C. B. S. by raising the money for the last payment, $350, on a loan of $1,500, the society having agreed to transfer $250 over to the grant if this was done. Before the day of this meeting, through the special efforts of both church and pastor, not only had this sum been provided, but nearly $100 more, which enables the church to cancel every dollar of indebtedness of every kind. If any doubts ever existed as to the right of this church to have been gathered or to exist, the record of these six years banishes them entirely. Organized with 11 members, it has received during the four years of the present pastorate 112 members on confession and 64 by letter, a total of 186. It has a Sunday school of over 200. Superintendent Greene of the C. S. S. and P. S., who was moderator of the organizing council, and two lay delegates are the only members of that council now in the State. This "remnant" of that body were present on this anniversary occasion.

WALLA WALLA.—First. During the absence of the pastor, Rev. E. L. Smith, to whom has been given a three months' vacation, Messrs. Holdredge and Dixon, the evangelists, are in charge doing faithful work. They have arranged for three classes in Bible study, one of which is to take a general course of the whole Bible, another to study prophecy and the other the Sunday school lessons. One class meets for an hour each day, the others weekly through the summer. This is the oldest Congregational church in the State, having been gathered in 1864. It still worships in the old building, but new and larger accommodations are planned. The new location has already been agreed upon and arrangements made for its purchase.

DAYTON.—This church is doing good steady work under the care of Rev. F. B. Doane. It has suffered some from removals, but the accessions of some persons having large influence in the community have enabled it to more than hold its own.

OTHER CHRISTIAN WORK.

A new feature of the Northfield series of meetings this year is a summer school for the study of the Bible. It will be in charge of Dr. C. I. Scofield, pastor of the Congregational church. The course deals specially with questions concerning the Pentateuch, its unity, typology, relation to geology, etc., the person and work of Christ, the kingdom, its relation to the Davidic covenant, to the church, etc. Prof. Howard Osgood of Rochester University, W. J. Erdman of Philadelphia and other well-known Bible students will take part. It is hoped that this school will become a permanent feature of the Northfield movement. No fees will be charged for tuition during the present course, which lasts from July 6 to Aug. 24.

A fund left by the late Deacon Philo Carpenter of Chicago, to be used in opposing secret societies, enables the New England Christian Association to offer prizes of $300—$75 and $25—for the best manuscript on Secrecy and Citizenship setting forth the evils of secret associations. The manuscripts are not to exceed 15,000 words, and must be sent in not later than Jan. 1, 1897. All letters of inquiry should be addressed to the secretary, Rev. James P. Stoddard, N. E. Christian Association, 218 Columbus Avenue, Boston.

JUBILEE AT KNOX COLLEGE.

This year's Commencement commemorated the fiftieth anniversary of the graduation of the first class sent out from Knox. In the class of 1846 there were nine students, four of whom are still living. Two took part in the exercises. A portrait of the first president, Rev. H. H. Kellogg, presented by his son, was received by the Alumni Association, also one of Rev. Jonathan Blanchard, who was president when the first class graduated and for twelve years afterwards, the presentation address being made by Dr. J. E. Roy, who cherishes warm and tender memories of the man under whose management of the college 192 persons were trained for their life work. It was altogether fitting that the son of Mr. Blanchard, now president of Wheaton College, should preach, as he did, the baccalaureate sermon and should take as his text, "After thy fathers shall be thy sons." Other addresses during these festive days were given by Dr. J. L. Withrow and Comptroller J. M. Eckels. Dr. Withrow and Judge P. S. Grosscup of Chicago were honored with the degree of LL. D., Mr. Eckels with that of A. M. and Prof. George Churchill with the degree of Ph. D. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon Rev. H. M. Carr and Rev. C. F. Gates, president of Harpoot College. The graduating exercises were unusually interesting. Miss E. L. Shrimpton, in her salutatory, magnified the half-century of the life of the college, and Miss Cline did full justice to the womanhood of the pioneers. The work of fifty years was treated specially in an oration prepared by Ernest W. Cushing, while the duties of the scholar in politics were set forth in the Master's Oration delivered by George Candee Gale. Sixty-four persons were graduated this year. During the year there have been 672 students in the institution who have received instruction from thirty professors and tutors. Of the 1,000 graduates already sent out from Knox, six are college presidents, twenty college professors, 100 ministers and missionaries, eighty lawyers, forty physicians, twenty-five journalists and editors, while a host have filled their lives with usefulness as teachers, merchants, farmers and honorable citizens.

Although Knox has reason to rejoice in her history, she by no means feels that she has attained even to her majority. Her youthful president, Dr. Finley, has the confidence and esteem of all who know him, and under his pushing management the institution is fast enlarging its equipment and adding steadily to its endowment. In its control Presbyterians and Congregationalists are equally represented. FRANKLIN.

THE RELATION OF THE CHURCH TO THE LABOR MOVEMENT.

Rev. Herbert Casson, pastor of the Labor Church, Lynn, created quite a sensation in the Boston Ministers' Meeting last Monday as he attempted to point out the relations between the working man and the Christian Church. This ardent leader in the labor movement is a slender, delicate looking young man, with a frank, straightforward manner, but he soon proved himself capable of speaking with fire and energy and telling sarcasm. He began his address by dwelling upon the discontent of the working men with the conditions under which they work, contrasting the statistics regarding the distribution of wealth and the demand for labor with those of fifty years ago and speaking bitterly against the accumulation of vast property by capitalists.

Mr. Casson went on to declare that the plain fact is that the present relation between the church and the working man is one of mutual indifference. They are going in different directions independent of each other, doubtless with misunderstandings on both sides. Working men are out of touch with the church, not only because Sunday is their only day for recreation and domestic enjoyment, but because the church, as they look at it, is incompatible with the struggle for industrial democracy that is going on—the struggle for brotherhood and for an equalization of life's opportunities. Working men are repelled by the noncommittal attitude which clergymen take toward the labor movement. Moreover, those who have studied political economy become impatient at the stale definitions and old theories which they hear advanced in church.

Laboring men criticise the churches also for devoting attention to theological discussions, banquets and socials when multitudes are longing for sympathy in their common life, and affirm that the church should lower its precepts or elevate its practice. There is too great a contrast, they say, between the agonized stress of business life and its theological dogmas; between the verse, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," and the church's perpetual demand for money; between the command to love one another and its 240 sects; between the Christ in whom working men do now and have always believed and the organization that calls itself by his name. Working men no longer believe in prayer, but they believe that they are working for what the church has been praying for years; that they are doing in the cellar the work that is the foundation of structures of peace, brotherhood, kindliness and love. The church has misunderstood the labor movement, because of its new, strange ways and rough leaders, but its heart, its aims are genuinely Christian.

A vote of thanks to Mr. Casson was passed after some discussion, with the distinct understanding that this did not involve the indorsement of his statements. Before the meeting adjourned Rev. P. T. Stamford read a brief paper on the Future of the Negro in the United States.

ONE OF 200.

Heppelwhite taught his pupils that a reverence for Hogarth's line of beauty was a first principle in art.

The famous Hogarth line is very much in evidence in the framing of this table, and the design is one of the most popular of the new patterns of the year 1896.

Not one person in a dozen can be trusted to choose a table wisely. You need to judge the effect from all distances and at all angles. In proportion as the table is simple in form, choice becomes more difficult.

The top of this pattern measures 26 inches. This is a very convenient size for all average needs, and at price marked (only $15 00) is good value. Our special exhibition of new Tables will continue for six days longer.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

No effort is being made to push business and it waits upon the acts of political conventions. The St. Louis Republican Convention, whose platform is expected to be announced today, is one of the most important ever held in this country. Not since slavery days has such an important question come up for settlement as this matter of gold or silver standard.

Mercantile collections continue poor. The cotton, woolen and iron and steel industries show no imorovement. Woolen mills are so universally idle that there is little prospect of higher prices for the staple, unless it sympathizes in a general advance all along the line, which would be apt to follow the adoption of a sound platform at St. Louis. Cotton goods are selling on a lower basis than the raw material and dry goods of all descriptions are sluggish in movement. The iron and steel combinations continue to strive to maintain prices, but the latter are frequently cut. During May railroad earnings showed a slight increase over last year in the face of a heavy shrinkage in bank clearings.

The Same... Old Sarsaparilla.

That's Ayer's. The same old sarsaparilla as it was made and sold by Dr. J. C. Ayer 50 years ago. In the laboratory it is different. There modern appliances lend speed to skill and experience. But the sarsaparilla is the same old sarsaparilla that made the record—50 years of cures. Why don't we better it? Well, we're much in the condition of the Bishop and the raspberry: "Doubtless," he said, "God might have made a better berry. But doubtless, also, He never did." Why don't we better the sarsaparilla? We can't. We are using the same old plant that cured the Indians and the Spaniards. It has not been bettered. And since we make sarsaparilla compound out of sarsaparilla plant, we see no way of improvement. Of course, if we were making some secret chemical compound we might.... But we're not. We're making the same old sarsaparilla to cure the same old diseases. You can tell it's the same old sarsaparilla because it works the same old cures. It's the sovereign blood purifier, and—it's Ayers.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

PILGRIM HALL, CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, JUNE 12.

Miss Carrie Borden presided, and, having attended the recent Arbitration Conference at Lake Mohonk, she spoke of that gathering and its purpose, especially as an illustration of the fact that men of eminence are seeking the upbuilding of the kingdom of God upon earth, dwelling also upon the part which women have in promoting this great object, and upon the relation of the whole subject to foreign missions. Micronesia and the missionaries there were again named with earnest petitions in their behalf. Mrs. Kellogg spoke of the summer scattering so near at hand, when new associations will be formed and new opportunities will offer to arouse and promote interest in this work.

Rev. and Mrs. Chauncey Goodrich of Tungcho, China, were present and made addresses. Mrs. Goodrich said that three centuries ago a monk at Macao, longing to enter China with the word of truth, exclaimed: "O rock, rock, when wilt thou open?" Now the rock has opened, and the gospel has been preached in every large city and thousands of villages. The truth is spreading, but it is impossible for a few to meet the present demands. She spoke also of the work of the missionary wives and mothers and the deep meaning of its lessons to Chinese women, of the relation of one part of the work to another and of the great detriment in being obliged to retrench and frequently cut off that which is very important, and begged that Christian women would not only give, but would use all possible influence to induce husbands and brothers and sons to make more diligent and efficient effort to support foreign missions.

Mrs. Judson Smith stated that among the missionaries supported by the Woman's Board are seventeen missionary wives. Mr. Goodrich, in a brief address, spoke of the advance which has been made during the three decades of his experience in China and the hopefulness of the present outlook. Letters just received from Miss Child from China and Japan were reported, also the anticipation of her approaching home coming.

Dr. Farnsworth of Cæsarea was introduced, and perhaps surprised every one when he announced that he would speak of "some of the good things" from Turkey. He told of the breaking down of the wall between Gregorians and Protestants; of fourteen new Sunday schools which Miss Closson has recently been able to establish in different districts of the city of Talas, in which the teachers and pupils of the girls' school act as teachers; of 370 recently present at a Sunday school in the girls' school building; of ten members just received to the church and nine children baptized; of another Sunday school in the main church building; of twelve prayer meetings held every week in Cæsarea on other days than Sunday; of the bravery of Miss Burrage in her experiences in Cæsarea, and of her kindergarten which is also a center for Sunday school work; of four large congregations in that city where crowds listen most intently to the preaching of the truth; and of the good news which has come from Yozgat and Marsovan and Van, showing that Mohammedans have been much affected by the martyrdom which many have suffered and the steadfastness of multitudes of the persecuted. Dr. Farnsworth expressed his own longing to return to the field where he has labored more than forty years, and with prayer and benediction brought to a fitting close the series of Friday meetings which have been held since September, and which have proved an inspiration to many who have come to them from near and from far. The meetings will be resumed the last Friday in September.

Better than Most Bicycles
The public is wise in values. It judges merit shrewdly. Bicycles of unknown worth will not sell at $100—the Columbia price. We might just as well offer Hartford Bicycles at $100, instead of $70, $65, $50, and $45. Yet the —— Rev. Dr. George L. Robinson of the Roxbury Presbyterian Church, Boston, has been elected professor of Old Testament literature and exegesis at Knox College, Toronto.

EDUCATION.

—— The closing exercises of the first year of the Long Island Latin School at Patchogue were well attended. The parts of the students were creditably taken and showed a high grade of work. There have been forty students this year. Rev. A. E. Colton resigns his pastorate in Patchogue to enter more thoroughly into the work of the school.

—— At Illinois College the baccalaureate sermon, June 7, was by Dr. E. P. Goodwin and the oration, on the 8th, by Hon. W. J. Bryan. At Commencement, on the 11th, Rev. S. B. Moore of Jacksonville received the degree of D. D. and Pres. J. W. Strong of Carleton College and Alexander G. Bell the degree of LL. D. Pres. J. E. Bradley announced that $20,000 had been raised as a condition of the gift of $25,000 by Dr. H. K. Jones, professor of philosophy, for a new library building.

—— For the first time for many years the Commencement exercises at Washburn College were held without the presence of Dr. Peter McVicar, who for twenty-five years has been the president. During the past year Dr. McVicar has been in California in feeble health. Mr. G. M. Herrick of Chicago was elected to the presidency at the annual meeting of the trustees and will enter upon his duties in September. The Graduating Class was larger than any preceding class, numbering ten men and five women. The Commencement address was by Rev. J. L. Hill, D. D. of Salem, Mass. The baccalaureate sermon by Rev. Linus Blakesley, D. D.

—— At the Commencement of Iowa College a letter from Rev. G. E. White of Marsovan, Turkey, asking for financial help for Anatolia College, resulted in a response to the amount of over $500. Mr. and Mrs. White are both graduates of the college. A class of forty members was graduated June 10. The address was by Prof. H. C. Adams of the University of Michigan, who is a graduate of Iowa and a son of Father Ephraim Adams of the Iowa Band. The address before the Christian associations was delivered by Rev. Eugene Updyke of Madison, Wis. Prof. S. G. Barnes of Longmeadow, Mass , a former professor, was given the degree of D. D. The college will celebrate its jubilee anniversary in 1898.

—— Commencement, June 9, at the School for Christian Workers, Springfield, Mass., marked the beginning and development of a forward movement in Sunday school and missionary endeavor. Fourteen young men and women went forth equipped for the fields long desiring their services. Dr. J. L. Hurlbut, the honored and well-known vice-president, gave an address upon the Christianity and the quality of lay workers demanded at the present day. Three advance steps have recently been taken. An extensive and adjoining property has been secured for a ladies' home. During the past two months twenty-five colleges and universities have been visited in the interests of the institution. Students, faculty and presidents have given hearty indorsements of the "new profession," and have expressed the belief that it demands as leaders college men and women, for whom, also, the institution is earnestly seeking. Most important of all, however, at the earnest request of the president, Rev. D. A. Reed, to whom the institution owes its existence, it was unanimously voted by thirty of the corporation and trustees present that the time had come when the institution should elect a president who should give his entire time to it. That it has a unique place in the future development of the church work cannot be questioned.

—— The American Institute of Sacred Literature, of which Pres. W. R. Harper is principal, announces a large number of summer Bible schools in various localities, showing that this feature of summer assemblies is being made more prominent every year. These schools, which are representative of the best Biblical instruction, begin early in July and continue throughout the summer. The school at Chautauqua, N. Y., will have as instructors Professors E L. Curtis and F. K. Sanders of Yale, Prof. D. A. McClenahan of the United Presbyterian Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., Professors W. R. Harper and Shailer Matthews of the University of Chicago, while special lectures are to be given by Dr. Joseph Agar Beet of England and Prof. George Adam Smith of Scotland. Other schools with excellent instructors will be held at Bay View, Mich ; Midland Chautauqua Assembly, Des Moines, Io.; Rocky Mountain Assembly, Glen Park, Col.; Lake Madison Assembly, Lake Madison, S. D.; Missouri Sunday School Assembly, Pertle Springs, Mo.; Louisiana Chautauqua, Ruston, Io.; Monteagle, Tenn.; Winfield, Kan.; and at the Summer School of Theology in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., as well as in several other places, West and South. All the summer Biblical work of the University of Chicago, in connection with which forty courses are announced, is affiliated with the institute.

IN MALARIAL POISONING.

Dr. J. T. Atterbury, of Estell, Miss.: "I have found BUFFALO LITHIA WATER an invaluable agent in the treatment of Malarious Fevers and their Cachexia and Sequels. Indeed, it is well-nigh specific in diseases of this character, and I believe that persons residing in the most malarious districts might find immunity from Malarious Fevers and their attendant evils from the use of this Water."

Dr. Z. M. Pascall, Oxford, N. C.: "In nothing is the action of BUFFALO LITHIA WATER, Spring No. 1, more remarkable than in malarial poisoning. In this class of disease it is incomparably superior to any other mineral water of which I have any knowledge. In Chronic Intermittent and Remittent Fevers it is especially efficacious, and it is not unusual that sufferers from these maladies find relief from a visit to these Springs after a failure of all the ordinary resources."

This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles, $5 00 f. o. b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent FREE to any address.

SPRINGS OPEN FOR GUESTS FROM JUNE 15TH TO OCTOBER 1ST.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

Each junior of the Northern Church, Toronto, after the Sunday morning service, writes on a card what seems the most helpful lesson from the sermon. The cards are afterward given to the pastor.

A junior Junior Society, called The Sunbeams, has been formed in a Toledo, O., church, where many children between five and nine years of age were considered too young for the work of the Junior Society. They have four committees: the lookout, Sunday school, missionary and flower.

A variety in the methods of electing officers has been tried by a Pittsburg society, which furnished each member at a sociable with a list of all the active members. Opportunity was given for each to mark privately on his list those that were his choice to fill the different offices. The ballots were received and counted by one member.

"San Francisco, '97," aroused much enthusiasm at California's convention held at San José. A telegram was received from The San Francisco Examiner pledging $1,000 to start the subscription list. The $7,000 already assured have made the financial prospect bright. The State secretary exhibited a large colored map showing the condition of the different counties. He reported 710 societies, with 34,080 members and gifts of $36,394. Additions to the churches from the societies have numbered 1,700. The juniors have done remarkably well and now number more than 300 societies, while the work for floating societies has been especially prosperous. In connection with a visit to the Lick Observatory a prayer meeting on Copernicus Peak, near Mount Hamilton, was held by a score of delegates.

A French pastor uses in his society a regular printed schedule suggesting more than twenty different lines of work. Three of these relate to personal religious work, informing the pastor of cases of sickness, and prayer for the pastor, church, society, and one's own particular work. The pastor assigns this individual work by checking titles in the schedule. The list covers such matters as special topics for prayer, calls, sewing, Sunday school work, the circulation of good religious literature, writing letters, work in the different meetings and missions, and matters relating to one's own religious life. Each schedule bears the date when it is issued and when it is to be returned to the pastor, with a full written report on what has been done. Dates, names and details are asked, so that a definite idea may be gained as to just what is accomplished. The society also has a prayer circle at which the pastor proposes definite subjects for prayer for a given time.

JOANNA C. MYRICK.

Mrs. Joanna C. Mills Myrick, widow of the late Rev. Osborne Myrick, died at Rutland, Vt., May 26. She was born at North Truro, Mass., Feb. 7, 1819. Since the death of her husband in January, 1892, physical infirmities have withdrawn her from much social and church life and kept her closely to the home of an orphan niece, to whom she had been as a mother from infancy. The call of death came without premonition on the evening of a day when she had been with the family and at table as usual. Mrs. Myrick was a quiet Christian lady, full of intelligent faith, and had given herself to the full measure of her delicate physical strength to the furtherance of her husband's pastoral work, both at Provincetown, where he had a pastorate of twenty-one years, and at Middletown Springs, Vt., where they gave themselves to their people with increasing love and esteem for twenty-five years. Their own home had been shadowed by the death of their three children only to qualify them for a service of exceptional sympathy and discreetness to the young people of other homes, with whom they had many and delightful relations.

THE CONGREGATIONALIST

Boston Thursday 25 June 1896

JAMES B. ANGELL, LL D.,
President for the last twenty-five years of the University of Michigan.

WHATEVER be the method of endowment of our great schools, may the day never come when they shall be inaccessible to the humblest youth in whom God has lodged the divine spark of genius, or that more common but sometimes not less serviceable gift of useful talent. Let not a misapplication of the laissez faire doctrine in political economy, which has its proper place, lead us to the mistake of building up a pedantic aristocracy. Good learning is always catholic and generous. It welcomes the humblest votary of science, and bids him kindle his lamp freely at the common shrine. It frowns on caste and bigotry. It spurns the artificial distinctions of conventional society. It greets all comers whose intellectual gifts entitle them to admission to the goodly fellowship of cultivated minds. It is essentially democratic in the best sense of that term.—From an address by Dr. Angell.

TWO THINGS.—The difference between purchasing one's furniture of a large furniture house like the Paine Furniture Co. and a small house or department store is not simply that you obtain a slightly lower price at the Paine warerooms, but that you have an infinitely greater variety of styles from which to select. The single exhibition of rattan and willow furniture now open at the Paine warerooms is almost as large in itself as an ordinary furniture store.

By the Rev. GEORGE B. STEVENS, D. D.
Cloth, pages 362, price $1.50 net.

It was not a foolish self-conceit which led Peter Parker to make provision in his will that his biography should be published under the direction of Yale University. The life was so full of interesting incident, so glowing with lofty purpose, and so brilliant in successful accomplishment that it had been a shame to leave the book unwritten. As the founder of medical missionary work in China, as the invaluable helper of the first diplomatic agents of the United States in the Celestial kingdom, as the holder of high official positions and the possessor of the highest esteem of both Chinese and Americans, Dr. Parker's record is that of a singularly useful and successful life. The story has been well woven together, and those who read it will find something of the secret of the power of the notable man whose life it records.

MR. HENRY JAMES: "The beauty of the thing had the effect of rendering doubly heart-breaking, as one read, the extinction of a talent that could still give one such a sense of freshness and life, of not yet having played, as it were, its highest card. I got from it a sense of new resources altogether; of his striking a new chord. . . . What I allude to more particularly is what he seems to have been intending in the figure of the elder woman. That intention was surely one of the finest — poetically, pictorially speaking, wasn't it quite the finest that ever guided his pen?"

IT is the season of Commencements and degrees. Whether the undergraduate gets more satisfaction from the Class Day exercises, promenades, tree plantings, floats and whatever other parting festivities mark the close of the academic year, or the ministers and others from the new train of capital letters which they become entitled to append to their names, we have no means of knowing. The general diffusion of satisfaction is, however, a delightful thing and we congratulate the A. B.'s and B. S.'s and Ph. D.'s and D. D.'s and LL. D.'s upon the passing over of the joy of anticipation into that of realization. The world ought certainly to be richer for the letting loose upon it of so much crowned and recognized talent. So far as our judgment goes the college year has been a good and useful one and the degrees have not been shot at a venture from the academic bow.

What constitutes the claim of a Western college on Eastern benevolence? First of all, it ought to have the indorsement of our College and Education Society, which is supposed to sift thoroughly all claims upon Congregational purses. Second, it should be well located and actually doing efficient college work. Third, its own teachers, students and local constituency should be doing all in their power to support and advance the institution. All these conditions are fully met in the case of Pomona College in southern California. Its appeal, therefore, for funds to enable it to secure a conditional bequest of the Pearsons type ought to go home to many hearts. On page 1022 the facts are set forth tersely and convincingly.

We have elsewhere summarized the article by Professor Paine of Bangor on New England Trinitarianism in the New World for June. It is impossible to follow the course of the article, which is unfortunately more critical than constructive, in the brief space of a paragraph, and the living leaders of thought characterized in it may be trusted to answer for themselves, but for our own part we may say that while, on the one hand, we have no wish to depart from the historic position of the church, on the other we have no desire to prevent that re-examination of the historic theology which is the privilege of each new generation of believers. The essential postulate of Christianity, in our opinion, is that God for self-revelation and redemption became man and dwelt among us, and that in the man Christ Jesus dwelt all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. So, also, we believe that, as the humanity of Christ began on earth, it continues in his eternal state. It is the divine, yet human, Jesus in whose power and love we trust and to whom the church is to be joined in holy marriage in the heavenly life. If it be impossible to make an elaborate statement of Christian doctrine without emphasizing the divinity at the expense of the humanity, or the humanity at the expense of the divinity, nevertheless the harmony of faith consists in holding both without contradiction or dispute.

It is interesting to note how slight variance, if any, there is now in the problems which Christians the world over face. To illustrate: The report on Religion and Morals read to the recent Free Church General Assembly of Scotland made it clear that the hindrances to spiritual life in Scotland today are the self-indulgence of Christians, undue devotion to sports and amusements, intemperance, sectarian divisions, and the unwholesome influence of much of the current literature and the secular press. Could a more correct diagnosis of the situation in New England, for instance, be made?

We asked a dissatisfied parishioner why he disliked the preaching of his new minister. "I am tired of going to Chicago with him," was the answer. It seemed that in nearly every prayer meeting talk and often in sermons he was accustomed to say, "When I was in Chicago," and to compare the conditions of church life in his present charge unfavorably with those in the place from which he had come to it. This is an instance of a lack of thought and tact in little things which often hurts a pastor's influence. If we are careful of the feelings of one person with whom we talk, all the more we ought to be of the feelings of fifty or 500. An extreme and amusing instance of this particular fault was that of the local preacher in a little fishing village far down on Cape Cod, who said one day, in beginning a discourse upon the parable of the Good Shepherd—with a wave of the hand toward a little group of city boarders—"We who have lived in more favored climes have seen sheep feeding upon the hillsides." These flaws of taste and tact are far more hurtful to a pastor's influence than we realize or are ready to acknowledge.

The New York correspondent of The Standard calls attention to the fuller manning of the Protestant Episcopal churches of that city as an element of their larger relative growth. "Among eighty-six churches," he says, "there are only eighteen where one clergyman does all the work. There are twenty-nine which have two clergymen, and there are twenty-nine which have three or more." Trinity has five regular clergymen and twenty-eight at work in the parish. In the readjustment of work necessitated by modern city conditions, it is clear that we must for economy of resources return to the apostolic practice of a varied and numerous ministry.

THE ANN ARBOR ANNIVERSARY.

In referring to the University of Michigan upon the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the entrance into service of its distinguished president, James B. Angell, which occurs this week, we do not forget the great work being done by other institutions which, unlike that of Ann Arbor, are dependent upon personal donations and over which other distinguished Congregationalists are presiding. For the present we join in the extended satisfaction which recognizes the eminent usefulness of the illustrious president, who now completes this special work of a quarter of a century. We may be indulged, we think, in a little pride which the great number of names of men whom our own churches have furnished to the cause of higher education naturally excites; and President Angell is among the highest.

The visitor at Ann Arbor is at once pleasantly impressed by the college plateau of forty acres, with its many trees, its graceful walks, its fine buildings artistically placed and its multitude of students passing to and fro at the proper hours. The coeducation of young men and young women here seems natural and it ceases to excite attention. As the students live with private families, there is none of the air of Dartmouth, or Harvard, or Yale, or, at the other extreme, of Wellesley, or Smith. This Western university—it was Western a little while ago—has worked out its own character, not only in the problem just suggested, but also in the great questions of education involved in the elective and professional systems. The elaboration of the various problems has been largely limited to the administration of President Angell, with the co-operation of the admirably qualified body of teachers who have been called to his help.

A few comparisons may illustrate the great forward changes which have taken place in the period from 1871 to 1896. At the first-named date the university had six buildings; now there are seventeen, among the additions being the beautiful library, the gymnasium, almost matchless, the scientific museum, the physical and hygienic laboratory, the engineering laboratory and two hospitals, while some of the older buildings have been greatly enlarged. Then there were 20,000 volumes in the library; now there are 100,000. Then there were three departments, arts, medicine and law; pharmacy, homeopathic medicine, dentistry and engineering have been added and the semi nary system was introduced in 1878. Then the only laboratory was the chemical; there have been added physical, zoölogical, botanical, histological, physiological, hygienic, engineering and anatomical. The courses of law and medicine were two years of six months each, now in law they are three years of nine months each and in medicine four years of nine months each. Then there were thirty-six teachers; now the names of 170 grace the roll. Then the annual expenditures amounted to $82,000; now they amount to nearly $400,000, while gifts have been received of something over $460,000. Then 1,110 students were in attendance; now there are 3,000.

It will, of course, be remembered that this is a State institution, and that it has the advantage of a State tax upon property for its support, as well as the income from property given by the national Government for such purposes. Very much the larger part of its income is thus derived, and the State has made appropriations for various buildings, but even this great advantage required the leadership suitable to secure the results found at this commemoration. These have required a man who could inspire public confidence, who could be broad and far-sighted in plans, who could be skillful in securing his objects, who could be wise in administration and who could unite the intellectual ability which professors and students demand in their chief with the qualities of heart which secure the instinctive attachment of those who come within their range. Success is the test of these qualities.

President Angell, a graduate of Brown University in 1849, became professor of modern languages in that institution in 1853, after the intervening study in Europe, and was also editor of the Providence Daily Journal from 1860 for several years. From 1866 to 1871 he was president of the University of Vermont, and from that position he went to Ann Arbor. His work in this presidency has been substantially uninterrupted, except by calls to important national service. He was United States minister to China, appointed in 1880, being also appointed chairman of a special commission to negotiate a treaty with that Power. He was appointed a member of the United States Fishery Commission by President Cleveland, September, 1887. He has been regent of the Smithsonian Institute since September, 1887. President Angell's thorough knowledge of international law is everywhere admitted.

The university being a State institution, its religious position is a matter of peculiar delicacy. But over the organ in the great university hall are the following words, taken from the national ordinance of 1787: "Religion, morality and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged." The various denominations have their churches in Ann Arbor, and the Christian Association has an elegant stone edifice just outside the grounds. While the professors are scattered in various churches, the president is an active member of the Congregational church. He has taken important part in our National Councils and in our International Council at London in 1891, and he has been a member of prominent committees in our foreign missionary board.

We understand that the exercises at Ann Arbor will be simple, as becomes a waymark and not a conclusion—a grateful recognition of work accomplished as the prophetic assurance of work to come. Who can measure the power which has been sent out into the world through these twenty-five successive classes?

THE REPUBLICAN NATIONAL CONVENTION.

The national convention of the Republican party held last week in the city of St. Louis will ever be considered as remarkable, and for the following reasons:

1. A candidate for the highest office in the gift of the American people was selected on the first ballot. Not since the year 1868 has the party witnessed a like phenomenon, and then the man was the greatest military leader of the Civil War, the hero of the North, U. S. Grant.

2. The opposition of party bosses and the scheming of veteran managers, men versed in all the tricks of their craft, were as puny and inconsequential at St. Louis as they had been in the State conventions, and a man of the people, the champion of a principle and identified with it, whose preliminary campaign had been generaled by an American business man, Mr. Hanna, was given the coveted honor and provided with a vice-presidential candidate of his own choosing. This fact also is remarkable if one will but scan the history of American politics.

3. Profiting by its recent experience the party, while reasserting in most unequivocal terms its belief in a tariff for protection as well as for revenue, is not to be as dogmatic in this campaign as in the past in its advocacy of specific schedules or schemes.

4. And, most notable and important of all, compromise and shiftiness have been put aside, principle has been enthroned above policy, and a plank setting forth the party's creed on monetary standards has been formulated which cannot be misinterpreted and must be accepted by the candidates and indorsed or rejected by the electors with perfect understanding of its import. Already the occasion of a significant and somewhat formidable bolt from the party by leaders who may or may not have their States' indorsement for so bolting, the beneficent influence of this unequivocal declaration will become more and more apparent as the days pass by. It furnishes a sure rallying point for men of certain convictions to fight a defensive or offensive battle around, and will force to the front far beyond all other issues one which must be faced, settled and settled right before either national or individual prosperity can return or will abide. For it is none the less true now than of old that "righteousness exalteth a nation," and pledges of our national credit cannot be settled for fifty cents on a dollar without national dishonor and individual distress. As a young, lusty to be sure, but still a debtor nation we cannot with safety or honor overlook the fact that one of the vital things which makes the Christian West superior to the Mussulman East is the security which it gives to the man of thrift that all of that which he saves and invests today can be at his command tomorrow.

Whether these candidates will be elected is a result dependent upon much that no mortal can foresee. Whether, if elected, they will rise to the level of statesmanship and mastery of the unusually intricate problems, domestic and foreign, which we are facing as the century dies, time alone will reveal. Fortunately they are both men of irreproachable character, elevation of thought and ideals, some experience in dealing with public affairs, and so near the plain people as to know what they believe and feel and desire.

A convention which records the will of the rank and file and puts one side the schemes of "bosses" is a sign of health and rejuvenation in a party that has no more reason to expect perpetual life than the Whig party had, unless it proves its right to so endure by perpetually bringing forth wholesome fruit. A political party which enters on a contest free from the danger of treachery within after the issue is joined is able from the first to throw its whole force against its real foe, and if the St. Louis convention has done nothing else it has purged the Republican camp of men who were dangerous because mutinous, and it has defeated the schemes of certain bosses who have hitherto harmed the party or manipulated it for their own selfish ends.

THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD IN OUR NATIONAL HISTORY.

In nothing else is the divine control of human affairs more evident than in national history. Its manifestations often are as striking as they ever are in relation to individuals, while their magnitude renders them far grander and more solemn. And no other nation has had a history more instructive in respect to the divine superintendence than our own.

The thoughtful student of our past is amazed that our national independence ever was gained. Political rivalries and corruption, shameful though they are today, were far worse then, in spite of many patriotic and noble individual exceptions, than they are now. Had not God meant us to become a nation, overruled events for that end, raised up Washington and other worthy leaders, and defended us from some of the consequences of our own folly and wickedness, we never should have become a nation. But alike in the character of the controlling spirits who settled our country, in the course of events which led to the birth of our nation, in the gathering and generally successful assimilation of citizens from all over the world, and in the marvelous prosperity which on the whole has been ours, the divine guidance is conspicuous.

This is equally evident when our national afflictions and humiliations are considered. The great rebellion, disastrous and terrible although it was, has resulted in great public advantage in many ways. Even the assassination of Lincoln and Garfield caused fresh demonstrations of the solid stability of our institutions. Our career has not been characterized by that unexampled virtue and prosperity for which our fathers too sanguinely hoped, but it has been remarkably successful, and, unless the public conscience becomes hardened in these later days, our future is rich in promise. And in everything the goodness of divine providence to us as a nation is impressively evident.

But we need, both as individual citizens and as a people, to acknowledge God more frankly and humbly. The spirit of materialism, of greed of gain, of unrighteous ambition and of reckless self-confidence is abroad in the land and is working immense evil. God will not abandon us if we do not disregard him. But if we allow the corruption, which has ruined so many nations in the past, to prevail among us it will surely ruin us. It is the part of the patriot to acknowledge God as our nation's hope and stay, and to obey his will in public as carefully as in private affairs.

CURRENT HISTORY.

The St. Louis Convention.

The national convention of the Republican party, held in St. Louis last week, met Tuesday noon and adjourned early Thursday evening. Free from some of the elements of strife, which have made many of its predecessors notable, it was by no means an uneventful or unimportant convention, as we have tried to point out in another column. There never was any question of Mr. McKinley's nomination. The movement for him had gathered too much headway, was too irresistible to be overcome by any combination that could be brought to pass at the convention. The action of the national committee in preparing the preliminary roll of delegates and the action of the committee on credentials in determining who were entitled to seats in the convention doubtless was ruthless at times, but if it crushed good men it also crushed bad men, and the convention did no better work than in spurning with contempt the Addicks faction of Delaware, the Cuney faction in Texas, and in giving to the anti-Platt Republicans of New York a standing in the convention. Hon. J. M. Thurston of Nebraska won additional fame as a man of ability and breadth by his work as permanent chairman. Senator Lodge of Massachusetts covered himself and his State with glory by his masterly rallying and leadership of the delegates who favored an unequivocal declaration for the gold standard. Senator Teller, by far the ablest of the advocates of the free coinage of silver, after a manly fight before the committee on resolutions, and after the convention had indorsed overwhelmingly the declaration in favor of the gold standard, made a candid, impressive and pathetic speech of farewell, and then, after Senator Cannon of Utah had read a formal protest, walked out of the convention hall, Senators Cannon of Utah, Pettigrew of South Dakota, Dubois of Idaho, Congressmen Hartmann of Montana and Allen of Utah, and fifteen other delegates from Utah, Nevada, Idaho and Colorado following him. Senator Mantle of Montana and Senator Shoup of Idaho subsequently repudiated the platform though refusing to leave the party. The customary unanimous indorsement of the candidates followed the decisive verdict of the first ballots, and the delegates, as they departed for home, certainly left with fewer heart-burnings and less factional hatred than have been known at most prior conventions. The citizens of Ohio and New Jersey, irrespective of party, have made remarkable demonstrations of pleasure at the honor conferred upon their fellow citizens.

The Successful Republican Candidates.

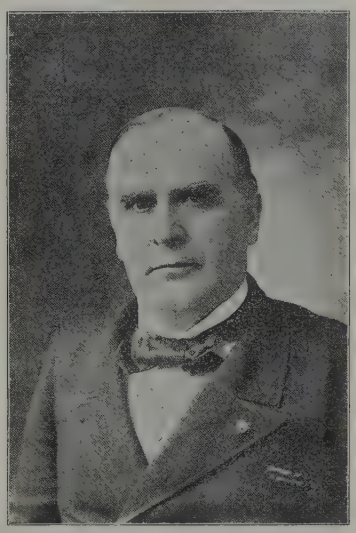
On the first ballot Hon. William McKinley of Ohio received 661 votes out of 906 —454 being necessary for choice—Mr. Reed of Maine only 84—even New England failing to give him its unanimous support—Mr. Quay of Pennsylvania 61, Mr. Morton of New York 58 and Mr. Allison of Iowa 35. On the first ballot for vice-president Hon. Garrett A. Hobart of New Jersey received 533 votes, Mr. Henry Clay Evans of Tennessee 277 votes and ex-Governor Bulkeley of Connecticut 39.



Mr. McKinley is of sturdy Scotch-Irish stock blended with English and German strains of blood. His grandfather fought in the Revolutionary War and Mr. McKinley did gallant service in the Civil War, rising to the rank of brevet-major. Born in Niles, Trumbull County, O., Jan. 29, 1844, his scholastic education began and ended at one of the old-fashioned academies which have sent forth so many of our noted men and women. A lawyer by profession, a Methodist by inheritance and conviction, he lived the life of a struggling, honorable attorney at law until October, 1877, when he entered Congress as a Republican, and there he remained until the tidal wave of reaction against the tariff bill which bears his name. Since leaving Congress he has twice been elected governor of Ohio by enormous majorities. In Congress he developed ability of a certain kind. He had but few peers in the mastery of the technical details of tariff legislation, and while not the framer of the tariff law bearing his name, he did much to shape it and was the Republican party's leader on the floor of the House when the law was debated and passed. A friend of Civil Service reform, disposed to follow rather than lead when financial legislation was under discussion, his record as a congressman is fair, although not brilliant or great. In the Republican national convention of 1892 he showed himself a man of principle by instantly suppressing a movement to name him as the candidate, he insisting that Ohio had sent him and his colleagues to promote the candidacy of Mr. Harrison, and that the people's will must be done. Mr. McKinley's personal character is above reproach. He is domestic in his tastes and loyal to the sanctities of home.

Mr. Hobart, a scion of English and Dutch stock, was born in Long Branch, N. J., in 1844. He graduated at Rutgers College when he was twenty, was admitted to the bar in 1869, soon began to fill important positions in Passaic County and the city of Paterson, where he made his home and now lives, and in 1872 began a notable career as State legislator, where he soon rose to the place of president of the Senate. Since 1884 he has represented his State on the Republican national committee and been the most influential Republican of the State, chiefly because he has not attempted to be a boss. The foremost citizen of Paterson, a trustee of a Presbyterian church, a legal adviser for and president or director of very many manufacturing corporations, a genial, approachable, popular man, he unites with business sagacity and clean character a knowledge of parliamentary affairs which will enable him to preside competently over the Senate if elected, while his experience as a political manager of the best type and his popularity as a man will probably enable him to swing New Jersey into the Republican column for the first time since the Civil War.

The Platform.

The Democratic party is held responsible for having precipitated a panic, blighted industry and trade and stimulated foreign production for the American market. The policy of protection is declared to be "the bulwark of national development and prosperity," but the party in the approaching campaign is not "pledged to any particular schedule. The question of rate is a practical question to be governed by the conditions of the time and of production." Mr. Blaine's reciprocity scheme, which the Cleveland administration has destroyed, is indorsed and declared to be a twin measure with a protective tariff. A restoration of the American merchant marine by establishing discriminating duties in favor of vessels built, owned and officered by Americans is urged and pledged. The need of a firm, vigorous and dignified foreign policy, especially in guarding our interests in the western hemisphere, is asserted and our dominance in Hawaii and over the Nicaragua Canal made part of such a policy, while the Monroe Doctrine "in its full extent" is accepted as the party's creed. Sympathy with the Cuban revolutionists is expressed most unequivocally, and the opinion ventured that Spain should be urged by the United States to restore peace and give independence to the Cubans. Sympathy with Armenia and indignation over her wrongs is voiced, and the declaration made that in Turkey "American citizens and American property must be absolutely protected at all hazards and at any cost." Fealty to the Civil Service Law is reasserted, lynching is condemned, a national arbitration tribunal to adjust industrial disputes is approved, and restrictive immigration legislation called for. The planks respecting temperance and woman's participation in public affairs are platitudinous and far from satisfactory, while the plank which indorses the scheme to admit Arizona and New Mexico as States is most reprehensible.

The plank over which there was the bitterest contest in the committee on resolutions was the one stating the party's position on national monetary standards. There is abundant reason for believing that when the convention opened neither Mr. McKinley nor Mr. Hanna, nor the delegates from the Middle West, were prepared to make any such unequivocal statement as is found in the plank which was adopted, and the credit for carrying it through the committee on resolutions is due to the campaign of education systematically carried on, especially by Senator Lodge of Massachusetts and his fellow-delegates from Massachusetts, together with men of the same mind from the other New England and the Middle Atlantic States. On a roll-call of the States and a poll of 922 delegates the committee's declaration was indorsed by a vote of 810 to 112, and this with the distinct understanding by the delegates when they voted that the adoption of the plank would lead immediately—as it did—to a bolt by Senator Teller and other men long identified with the party, some for many years, and all of them representing States changed from Territories to States by fostering Republican legislation, and in sympathy with the platform on all other points. Following is the plank adopted:

The Republican party is unreservedly for sound money. It caused the enactment of the law providing for the resumption of specie payments in 1879; since then every dollar has been as good as gold.

We are unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency, or impair the credit of our country. We are, therefore, opposed to the free coinage of silver except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved. All our silver and paper currency must be maintained at parity with gold and we favor all measures designed to maintain inviolably the obligations of the United States and all our money, whether coin or paper, at the present standard, the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth.

The Outlook.

The more intelligent Republicans realize that the fight of this campaign is to be bitter and disruptive of old party ties, but they are confident, nevertheless, that the people next November will indorse the action of last week's convention, especially if the Democratic party declares for free silver at Chicago, as it now seems likely to do, notwithstanding President Cleveland's call to arms and Mr. William C. Whitney's determination to assume leadership of the gold standard Democrats at Chicago. Declarations respecting party policy from Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Whitney not only have no weight in the South and West, but they serve as irritants, Mr. Cleveland being identified with a bond-issuing policy that has kept us on a gold basis, and Mr. Whitney standing for organized capital, which the Populists and many Democrats hate with a perfect hatred because they believe it to be stolen in part, if not in whole, from the people. Moreover, not only are the Democratic conventions of California, Idaho, Arkansas and Delaware declaring for the free coinage of silver and electing men to go to Chicago to work for it and a candidate who believes in it, but sentiment in favor of free coinage of silver is cropping out in Maine, Connecticut, Massachusetts and New York, and though Minnesota and Florida Democrats during the past week have elected gold standard delegates to Chicago the more significant fact is that New England will not send a united delegation of men with like views, while men of the standing of ex-Congressman G. F. Williams and ex-Mayor Matthews are admitting that they will support the regular Democratic nominee no matter what his financial views are. On this point, however, they do not speak for most of the men of the faction in the Democratic party which they have been supposed to represent.

The bolting Republicans of the silver producing States have indorsed the presidential candidacy of Senator Teller of Colorado, and a representative committee of Populists, without committing their party, has indorsed his nomination. Truth to tell, conditions throughout the Interior and West are chaotic, and combinations of voters that would have been scoffed at one year ago are now within the range of probability. A clean-cut issue has been made by the money plank of the Republican convention, and a process of disintegration and realignment is to go on between this and November the like of which has not been seen since Sumter was fired on.

International Arbitration.

Rumors of a conflict between the British and the Venezuelan forces in the territory which is in dispute threatened, last week, to complicate the progress of a peaceful solution of the controversy between the great European Power and the South American republic. But the British Foreign Office has had no official notice of any such clash of arms. Both Lord Salisbury, in replying to a deputation representing the English international arbitration movement, and Mr. Curzon, under secretary of foreign affairs, in a speech made in the House of Commons, have admitted during the past week that progress was being made toward the perfection of a permanent tribunal to arbitrate on all Anglo-American differences of opinion incapable of being settled by the usual methods of diplomacy. And while neither President Cleveland nor Secretary Olney have indorsed this statement explicitly, inquiries made at the State Department have failed to bring forth any denial of its substantial truth, hence we may reasonably infer, as well as hope, that the ideal which so many of the best men and women of this country and Great Britain long to see is slowly but surely becoming a great vital fact. How much reason there is to work and pray for such a happy consummation Dr. Gladden sets forth very conclusively in his argument which we print elsewhere.

That there are some serious but not insurmountable obstacles to be overcome before all the details of such a plan can be perfected, ex-Minister Phelps makes clear in his article in the July Atlantic, and Prof. Theodore S. Woolsey demonstrated the same fact to the members of the Connecticut Valley Congregational Club at its meeting in Easthampton last week. No one supposes that the creation of such a tribunal will usher in the millennium or put an end to all chances of war between Great Britain and the United States; but it does seem as though the time had come when two civilized nations, with the same language, the same Bible, the same system of common law and the same faith in the rule of the people, should agree to govern their actions, when they differ, by the same code of ethics that Christian gentlemen accept. It is to be regretted that the Republican national convention last week did not throw its influence in favor of this Anglo-American arbitration tribunal. That it did not was not due to the fact that it was not asked to.

The South African Complications.

Additional uprisings in Matabeleland indicate that the problem of British control in South Africa is not to be settled as speedily as some of the more sanguine eulogists of the British South Africa Company have predicted, and re-enforcements have been sent from Mashonaland and Cape Colony. The preliminary investigation of Dr. Jameson's case has ended and the grand jury has found true bills against Dr. Jameson, Sir John Willoughby and other high born officers who went with him on his raid. The Transvaal Republic, through the Cape Colony officials, has sent word to the British Foreign Office that it certainly expects, and not only expects but demands, that Sir Cecil Rhodes and Alfred Beit, directors of the British South Africa Company, be immediately brought to trial on charges similar to those against Dr. Jameson and the other leaders of the raid, the Transvaal Republic basing such a demand on evidence which it has in its possession that Dr. Jameson was but a subordinate executing orders from Sir Cecil Rhodes and others interested with him in the South Africa Company. Wherefore the Transvaal not unreasonably demands that the real conspirators against its life be made to feel the stern hand of British law. It also expresses its desire that the territory now controlled by the South Africa Company be taken under the more immediate control of Great Britain.

Turkey's Plight.

The revolt in Crete becomes more and more formidable and, though the Turkish troops at present on the island have not provoked a pitched battle, realizing their inferiority and disparity in numbers, they have done enough in occasional forays to reveal a temper and ferocity equal to any of the recent deeds of horror in Armenia. If it is true, as is reported, that the Druses of Syria have revolted and practically exterminated four companies of Turkish troops, then Turkey is called upon to face an uprising in a new quarter at a time when she can least afford to have her authority threatened and her military forces scattered.

The plank in the Republican convention platform expressing sympathy with Armenia, indignation at the Turkish atrocities, and declaring that the party will stand behind the present or any other administration which will protect American citizens and American property in Turkey "at all hazards and at any cost" is a good, wholesome utterance and will bring hope and confidence to American citizens in Turkey. If the Republican party is put in power again we hope the pledge it has just given will be redeemed, for there are a great many Americans who agree with Dr. Washington Gladden in the statement he made last week at Easthampton, when he said: "I would that Americans, instead of talking about fighting England, would reach their hands across the seas and say, 'In God's name fight (against Turkey and for outraged Christian communities in the Orient) and count us your allies.' I do not believe in peace with any such incarnate wickedness as Turkey."

NOTES.

The national legislature of Venezuela last week voted that that country should make gold its monetary standard.

Queen Victoria has just entered upon the sixtieth year of her reign. If she lives until Sept. 25 she will surpass George III.'s record of tenure as a sovereign.

The Supreme Court of Indiana, by upholding the constitutionality of the Nickolson Law, has buttressed one of the most effective excise laws on the statute books.

Ex-Secretary of the Treasury Bristow, who died in New York city, June 22, aged sixty-three years, was a Kentuckian who was a pronounced Unionist during the Civil War, a stalwart friend of the Negro and a pioneer in fighting for his civil rights, a fearless foe of all evildoers while United States district attorney in Kentucky, and the Secretary of the United States Treasury who smashed "the whiskey ring."

If it be true, as is reported as we go to press, that Mr. Balfour has announced the withdrawal of the Education Bill for the present session of the British Parliament, then a Tory-Unionist ministry with a majority of 150 has confessed what must be described as humiliating inability to meet and overcome the attacks of a Liberal minority and dissensions within its own ranks, and a splendid victory for Nonconformist and evangelical principles has been won.

The Drummond Castle, a steamer bound from South Africa to London, with nearly 300 souls on board, sank suddenly last week off the coast of Brittany, France, near the Molene Islands, and only three of its passengers or crew are known to have survived. From Japan comes the news of repeated shocks of earthquake accompanied by a tidal wave, causing the destruction of many villages and the town of Kamaishi in North Japan, with the loss of at least 30,000 inhabitants.

Pres. G. H. Wyckoff of the Bank of New Amsterdam, New York city, and a member of the First Congregational Church, Montclair, sat in his office June 15 attending to business. A debt-ridden man of good birth, by name Semple, entered the office, demanded that $6,000 be given to him, and, when Mr. Wyckoff declined to accede to his request, Semple shot the bank official and then himself. Semple died June 16 and Mr. Wyckoff died June 20. To such peril does connection with banking institutions subject men in these latter days.

"The power behind the throne" in China—the mother of the emperor—has just died. Li Hung Chang, after receiving much honor and attention at St. Petersburg, now is in Berlin, where he is receiving a like demonstration of regard for his ability and rank. He in turn, wherever he goes, is advancing as best he can, the interests of China—and Li Hung Chang—by negotiating commercial treaties and loans. He intends to stop and visit in this country on his way home and will doubtless receive much attention. He may, perhaps, be induced to permit American capitalists to enter in and profit by the more liberal trade policy which China seems to have definitely accepted.

IN BRIEF.

The sands of another half-year will have run out before a week speeds by. Are you living up to the standards which you set for yourself a brief six months ago?

The appreciation expressed on many sides of the article in our last issue, relating to a member of our own staff, leads us to say that advantage was taken of her absence in Europe to introduce into her department the sketch which she personally was loath to have appear.

Lord Muskerry, an Irish sinner of high degree, lay dying. His parson urged him to repent. "Repent? For what should I repent," demanded the old lord. "Why, I don't remember that during my whole life I ever denied myself anything." "Except the secret of life eternal," the parson might have replied.

The Bicycle News Department of the New York Evening Post of June 19 gave a list of fifty-eight clubs planning to have "runs" on Sunday, June 21, weather permitting. Careful inspection of the list fails to show a single club whose time of departure was set for the afternoon, and but few which avoided a conflict with Sunday morning services.

There is a quotation in our Australian letter which deserves the emphasis of editorial repetition—"Socialism awaits the advent of the socialistic man." This is to say that the cultivation of the individual must be kept up to the highest point if the greatest success of the community is to be assured, which is a truth too often forgotten or ignored.

President Angell has a double right now to the title doctor. Rutgers has just made him an LL. D. and the bestowment of the honor comes opportunely in view of the celebration this week of his twenty-fifth anniversary. He has, however, been for some time the worthy possessor of the same doctorate. It is a pity that these lucky recipients of superfluous degrees cannot pass them along to those of us who have none.

Canadian Congregationalists must have gone home from their annual sessions, which we report elsewhere, brimful of the denominational spirit, if six days of meetings could produce such an effect. Quite of a different color from ours are the annual reports of their home missions, and their desire for even greater success in missions is evidenced in what is at least a suggestive proposition for the federation of those interests.

The Watchman remarks that "the principal ground for the assertion that ministers are exceptionally poor financiers is that many of them receive their salaries so irregularly." This is true enough, but the whole assertion is absurd. There are spendthrift ministers, but most men in the profession are forced by the stern discipline of circumstances to make every dollar count. They live decently, bring up families above the average in number, and make provision for old age in a manner that is astonishing.

There are great advantages in being one's own executor. Pomona College, the pride and hope of southern California, has lost no less than three expected gifts because the persons died before carrying out their intentions and no lawful claim could be established upon the estates, even though the wishes of the dead were well understood. Mr. C. H. Baldwin, the gentleman who now gives one-fourth of his property to endow a professorship, evidently wants to enjoy while on this side the grave the satisfaction that arises from a large gift wisely placed.

At the Fall River meeting of the Massachusetts General Association Rev. W. W. Jubb moved a resolution of sympathy with our English brethren in their struggle against the government's reactionary educational policy. This expression was gratefully received and highly valued. Secretary Woods of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, in his letter of acknowledgment, writes that the Nonconformists will not rest content until an educational system as satisfactory and as efficient as the American is firmly established in England, and it looks now as if they were on the highway to victory.

The story of the man who signed a petition that he himself should be hanged is familiar, but The Watchman caps it with another quite as instructive:

A minister signed a petition which purported to be for a charitable purpose, and on the strength of his name nearly every reputable citizen in the town signed it. The first intimation that the minister had that he was the victim of a joke came with the formal notice that his application for a license to keep a saloon was granted, and that the license would be issued as soon as payment therefor was made.

Nobody has time to sign a document which he cannot first find time to read.

While the members of our English pilgrimage are gathering daily stores of information on various subjects they are also disseminating a knowledge of American terminology, as this incident, which took place in the hotel at Plymouth, shows: American Pilgrim to Waiter: "Please pass the crackers." Waiter, with puzzled look on his face: "You mean the biscuits, sir, do you not?" A. P.: "No, I mean crackers. Please bring us the crackers." Man departs and presently reappears and solemnly offers a plate upon which a pair of nut crackers are placed. Roars of laughter from the party. Waiter thinks ways of Americans are past finding out.

The first Sunday in July this year is so close to the national holiday that patriotic sermons will be particularly timely, and welcome, too, as a refreshing contrast to the gunpowder and hilarious festivities of the previous day's celebration. And, by the way, if a suitable theme is being sought, why would not the signal providences manifested in the history of Whitman College be a point of departure for an earnest appeal to maintain our distinctively religious institution for higher education? We would go one step further and suggest a contribution for Whitman to serve as a splendid form in which to crystallize the enthusiasm which these sermons will arouse.

Our Unitarian friends have the problem of dealing with ministers who come to them from other denominations in an aggravated form because of the small size of their own denomination. A correspondent of the Christian Register writes of it as follows:

Then, again, the drift toward a small body like the Unitarian of the liberalized and half-liberalized ministers of such overwhelmingly large denominations as the Methodist, Baptist, Congregationalist, Presbyterian and Episcopalian is simply appalling. Five from each one enumerated would fill all vacancies. The hospitality of the denomination in the direction indicated is plainly limited, unless many of our ministers of wholly Unitarian antecedents are turned out of doors.

A narrow gauge, altitudinous Protestant Episcopal, by name Papineau, recently addressed the Maine Diocesan Convention, Bishop Neeley being present and not rebuking him. The members of all churches other than the Protestant Episcopal Mr. Papineau described as "heathen," who are only awaiting the proclamation by Mr. Papineau and his fellow-ritualists that "we are the Catholic Church, opposed to Romanism on the one hand and Protestantism on the other. We must tell them that outside of this church there is no salvation," and then they will cease to be "heathen," and become God's children. The figures as to Protestant Episcopal growth in Maine during the past decade do not indicate that the "heathen" are likely to show great alacrity in embracing Mr. Papineau's scheme of salvation.

A large bank in New York city has recently been seeking for a young man to take a responsible position in the institution. There were many applications. The following questions were asked by the president of the bank in his examination of the applicants:

1. What church do you attend?
2. What Sunday school, and who is your teacher?
3. Where do you spend your evenings?
4. Who are your associates?
5. Do you ever use intoxicating drinks or tobacco?

The successful young man was he who could give an honest record of regular church and Sunday school attendance, show that he was not out evenings except for proper purposes, that his companions were wholesome and that he did not use intoxicants or tobacco. He is now occupying this important and lucrative position that has a large and promising future. So much for the commercial value of good habits.

How many listeners to a sermon or an address gain a correct idea of its central thoughts? Dr. Washington Gladden's address before the Smith College Seniors last week emphasized the lack of accurate knowledge respecting important issues that is so evident in a large class of our people. Incidentally he alluded to the recent agitation against the Roman Catholics and the credulity exhibited by those persons who accept without a question the glaringly false statements with reference to the papacy that have been in circulation in different parts of the country. One of the audience—herself a collegian—was asked at the close of the address, by some one not present, what Dr. Gladden's theme was. She replied that he argued that we must be on our guard against the aggressions of the Roman Catholics who are trying to overthrow American institutions. Considering the fact that Dr. Gladden has been one of the severest critics the A. P. A. has encountered and that he fellowships the Catholics to the extent that he can find common ground, as his speech at the Catholic jubilee in Springfield last Sunday testifies, we are forced to conclude that the young lady did not grasp his leading ideas with absolute accuracy.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM BOSTON.

An Excellent Start.

Speculation concerning the exact purpose of the New Congregational Church Union has been rife. Just what it can do and will do has not been altogether apparent, particularly to some of the older men, who have witnessed in years past repeated failures of movements in the same general direction. On the other hand there has been hardly any dissent from the general conviction that such an organization was needed to look after the interests of local Congregationalism in the growing suburbs and in the heart of the city itself. Ever since the new society was formally launched, three months ago, there has been an increasingly favorable disposition toward it on the part of the Congregational public. The hopes cherished are due to the facts that it is an incorporate body, that its twenty-seven directors represent almost as many churches, and that veterans in the denomination are joining with more youthful elements in the practical direction of its activities.

At the quarterly meeting of the directors last Monday, attended by nineteen out of the twenty-seven, the larger proportion substantial business men, the reports of President Darling, Treasurer Kelsey and Secretary Field were extremely encouraging. The directors are acting wisely in not scattering their energies, but are striving to do one or two definite and important things. The region in Dorchester, in the vicinity of Morton Street and Norfolk Street, is being looked upon as favorable to a new church, and, in connection with the Second Church in Dorchester and its representative in the City Missionary Society, steps are being taken to pre-empt the field for Congregationalism and to provide for its immediate cultivation if it is deemed wise. The attitude of Dr. Little and his people has been one of the utmost friendliness and of genuine co-operation. Whenever the leading church in any suburb joins hands with this new organization its work becomes far easier and more effective. The union is also putting its shoulder behind the new Brookline enterprise, and the substantial aid which it is furnishing greatly encourages those on the ground who have been maintaining afternoon services since the first of last November and who have now decided to begin morning services the first of next September, with a view to the immediate organization of a church and the calling of a pastor.

The union counts itself fortunate to have received from Mr. S. B. Shapleigh of Allston a valuable lot in North Brighton, on which stands a mission chapel. He has been largely instrumental in maintaining this little enterprise for a number of years, but now prefers to have it owned by this responsible body and operated in the way it shall deem best. It is hoped that this gift is only the forerunner of similar ones that will give the organization a substantial financial basis and permit it to do its work more successfully. It looks, indeed, as if the time has come when Boston Congregationalists are awakening to their duty to their own. No section of the country has been as generous with its gifts for the foreign field and for the frontier, but in order to maintain this degree of benevolence in years to come we are seeing that the territory near at hand must not be neglected. No organization has existed hitherto with the precise object of the C. C. U., and our most aggressive and sagacious leaders rejoice that business men are applying themselves to our local problems to the end that Congregationalism hereabouts shall be sturdier, more united and more influential than in the past.

Boyle O'Reilly's Monument.

Last Saturday afternoon the Vice-President of the United States, the governor of Massachusetts, the mayor of Boston, Gen. Francis A. Walker—president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology—Bishop Lawrence and President Capen of Tufts College, all of them Protestants and of non-Celtic stock, participated gladly in the ceremonies incident upon the unveiling of a splendid monument commemorating the Irish poet, Roman Catholic journalist and genuine American, John Boyle O'Reilly. The statue is a work of art, bronze and marble, shaped by the genius of Mr. D. C. French, which blend to form a symbolical group full of suggestion and inspiration. It stands at the head of Boylston Street, near the entrance to the Fens. O'Reilly was such a lovable man and in so many ways a typical Celt that he had but few, if any, enemies, hence it was easy to secure the funds necessary to erect this monument. But, with the pleasure non-Celtic New Englanders feel in contemplation of this memorial of a truly gifted man and straightforward friend or foe, there comes a blush of shame in the thought that neither Emerson, Hawthorne, Longfellow or Lowell have similar adequate memorials in the city that is the capital of the commonwealth that calls them sons. ☞

FROM THE INTERIOR.

The New Architecture.

Chicago has for some years been famous for high buildings. The excuse given is the value of the land on which they stand. We are to have a departure from the prevailing methods in the use to which the site of the western half of the old Grand Pacific will be put. Here, although the land is very valuable, the Illinois Trust and Savings Bank, one of the strongest financial institutions in the West, will erect a building for its own use exclusively. It will be but two stories high. It will cost about $300,000, and will be not far from one hundred and sixty feet square. The basement will contain the vaults of the bank itself and safety vaults for the use of the public. After careful study of many competing plans those furnished by Burnham & Co. were selected. The building will be ready for occupation by next May, possibly earlier. Its imposing columns on the La Salle Street front will bring it into comparison with the building which the Bank of England occupies in London, by which it was undoubtedly suggested.

Children's Day in Chicago.

At the Third Presbyterian Church (Dr. Withrow, pastor) three schools met for an afternoon service of song, recitations and brief addresses. Two of the schools were mission schools and were brought to the mother church to meet with those who belong to the home school. There could not have been less than 2,500 present. Crowded into the great audience room, their faces radiant with enjoyment, they were a sight to gladden the heart of any one. Best of all is the thought of the moral and spiritual influences under which this multitude of children is brought week by week.

Exercises in the First Congregational Church in the evening were equally interesting and enthusiastic. Those in the Union Park Church were unique in variety and attractiveness. Here, too, the audience-room was filled with children and their parents and friends, who had come to see them march through the aisles as they entered the church and listen to their songs and recitations. These services are suggestive of those held in all the churches of our name in the city and throughout the State. Secretary McMillen spoke four times during the day and filled a fifth appointment by proxy.

Another Gift to the University.

He that hath to him shall be given. The Manual Training School, valued with its plant and endowment at $250,000, has, by vote of its owners, been turned over to the university and accepted by its directors. This school has for many years filled an important place in the training of young men in the use of tools, in addition to giving them the instruction ordinarily imparted in the grammar and high schools of the city. It was founded by private gifts of gentlemen connected with the Commercial Club and has been managed by them. It now passes over with its accomplished principal, H. H. Belfield, LL. D., to the care of the university and will be made the preparatory school for a school of technology to be founded as soon as the means for it are in hand. The condition of the transfer is that the work now done in the school shall be continued and made permanent. The convocation exercises, the first week in July, will be of rare interest. Such men as George Adam Smith and Joseph Agar Beet are to be present, and it is announced that Mr. and Mrs. Rockefeller will visit the institution for the first time. The summer session of the divinity school bids fair to rival in attractiveness that of last year. The success which President Harper has had in drawing hither pastors in active service who can spare only a few weeks from their work and students of other seminaries who do not always know what use to make of the long vacation is suggestive, to say the least, of methods which other theological schools might employ to the great benefit of undergraduates and graduates.

Fargo College.

The friends of Fargo are beginning to look into the future with real hopefulness. The college has had a hard time thus far, but friends have nobly rallied to its support, and now it seems as if the tide had turned in its favor. Of course there is as yet no endowment worthy the name, only a plant prophetic of what is to be. But students are knocking at its doors, and with prosperity in the Dakotas means for its equipment will not always be wanting. Commencement this year was the best in the history of the college. The baccalaureate by President Simmons, June 7, from Matt. 9: 29, "According to your faith be it unto you," gave the keynote to the exercises of the week. R. J. Bennett, Esq., a business man from Chicago, spoke on missions in the evening, giving an account of his personal observations in the fields he had visited. His address was not only valuable but interesting. Another address which awakened much enthusiasm was given by President Fisk of the Chicago Theological Seminary on the claims of our republic upon its educated men and influential citizens. Graduating exercises and the alumni dinner with the postprandial speeches were full of interest because expressive of hopeful feeling, one might say of confidence, that the friends of the college will be able to meet Dr. Pearsons's conditions and within the limits he has fixed secure the $50,000 he has offered to give. More than ever was apparent the part these institutions of learning have in the intellectual and moral development of a State.

Sunday School Work in Iowa.

The custom of setting aside a day in connection with association meetings for Sunday school interests seems to have become permanent. At the convention held this year at Davenport the report of Rev. C. A. Towle, who has now been Sunday school superintendent for ten years, showed that thirty-three churches have grown out of the Sunday schools the C. S. S. and P. S. has organized, and that twenty of them have already secured houses of worship. The number of schools in the State has increased from 210 to 346 and the attendance from about 26,000 to 37,000.

Home Missions.

A little more money was raised in the State during the year than was expended. This means that new work was not undertaken, and that appropriations were greatly reduced. Still it is encouraging to close the financial year without a debt, although if fields appealing for aid are entered contributions must be more liberal than they have been. There are few vacant churches in Iowa. When vacancies occur they are speedily filled, since for Iowa, as for other Interior States, there seem to be more ministers than there are pulpits for them to occupy. Evangelistic services have been continued into the summer this year and with some marked results. In general the condition of the churches throughout the State has been very encouraging.

Flag Day.

In not a few of our churches Flag Day, June 14, was fittingly observed. Throughout the West it is expected that considerable will be made of the anniversary of the adoption of the flag, Saturday, June 20, this third Saturday in the month of June having been selected as the day upon which memorial services shall be held. A long list of schools and of the speakers who are to have part in these exercises in Chicago has been published and considerable enthusiasm aroused for them.

FROM AUSTRALIA.

Divorce in Australia.

We have been accustomed to look upon America as leading the world in the matter of easy divorce, but if things go on as they have been doing in New South Wales it may be expected that this colony will be by merit raised to that bad eminence. With a community of barely a million and a quarter there are more divorces than in England, with a population of thirty millions. More than other ministers the Anglican clergy take the matter to heart. Some of them decline absolutely to marry divorced persons, and others go farther and recommend the Anglican Church to excommunicate those of the flock who, after divorce, have remarried. Whatever may be said about the propriety of excommunication as directed against the sinning partner, it is surely a hard measure for those sinned against. The history of the marriage law in New South Wales shows clearly that the greater the facilities for divorce the greater will be the number of divorces. Whatever good effects may be put to the credit side of the legislation which was passed some years ago to extend the facilities for divorce, amongst thoughtful people the conviction seems to be growing that to its debit must be placed the making of marriage less solemn.

Death of a Veteran.

The mention of remarriage seems naturally to suggest to the mind Sir Henry Parkes, who died at the end of April. The deceased statesman was remarkable for a good many things, amongst others for having married at the ripe age of eighty. This was his third venture in matrimony, and he did not long survive it. Sir Henry was a picturesque figure. He filled first and last a considerable space in the life of New South Wales. Until within the last few years, indeed, he was a power in politics. So far as his political fame is concerned it might be said that "he would have lived longer if he had died sooner," yet he has left the impress of his commanding intelligence upon the institutions not only of his own colony, but of all the Australian colonies, and the constitution and much of the most important legislation of New South Wales were largely molded by him. Your Lincoln and Garfield do not furnish more striking illustrations—perhaps not such striking illustrations—of the power of a vigorous intellect to triumph over the obstacles lying in the way of personal advancement. He arrived in New South Wales as a raw and uneducated country lad, with a trade (that of a toymaker) most unsuited to the conditions of a colony in the formative stage of development. Yet he educated himself so as to become a forcible writer and one of the most powerful speakers who ever appeared upon an Australian platform, and for well-nigh half a century he was the most conspicuous force in the political life of New South Wales and had an influence throughout Australia not equaled by that of any other Australian politician.

A Touching Incident.

The removal of Sir Henry Parkes leaves Hon. G. H. Reid the leading politician in New South Wales. He had been a very determined opponent of the departed statesman, but while his rival lay dying he was one of the few allowed into the sick chamber, and it is a matter of history that the intercourse between the two was of such a character as greatly to cheer the dying man. Next month Mr. Reid will meet Parliament after a long recess and will unfold his program.

Women at the Polls.

In April last for the first time women voted for members of Parliament in South Australia. The number of votes was raised from a little over 70,000 to nearly 137,000. There were no such startling results from the women's votes as some seemed to anticipate. The ministry, whose policy has so strong a socialistic trend as to be scarcely distinguishable from that of the "labor party," came back to power, and the women do not seem to have materially affected the status quo in politics. One result of womanhood suffrage has been to make parliamentary elections more orderly. This seems generally conceded. Another has been to introduce new kinds of political machinery. "Afternoon teas" and similar social functions are now made by the enterprising Australian political woman effective electioneering agencies. Regaled by "the cup that cheers but not inebriates," political male orators are led forth by the sisters of their party to speak for the good of the cause. There are not wanting signs that the political female orator will be, if she has not already been, developed.

Queensland and Socialism.

In South Australia, as has been stated, the ministry in power has a strong leaning towards the labor party. That party's idea seems to be to make a god of government. "Let the government do everything for everybody" seems to be their motto. In Queensland the ministry in power recently went to the country on this very question, but with a precisely opposite ticket to that of the South Australian Government. There was a pitched battle between them and the labor party, the result being that the government won.

A Socialistic Experiment.

In the meantime the results of certain socialistic experiments in New South Wales do not seem very cheering to those who advocate that the state should do everything for everybody. On behalf of the needy, agricultural settlements were instituted in different parts of the colony. One of these was on distinctly socialistic lines. It was a conspicuous failure. Others were on individualistic lines. They attained a measure of success. With less pecuniary assistance and worse ground to work, they were more successful than the socialistic settlement. "Socialism," said Rodbertus, the socialistic philosopher, "awaits the advent of the socialistic man."

Strikers.

Socialism may be an impossible way of settling the social problem, but it is to be wished that some one could find a better way of settling it. There are strikes and rumors of strikes. The coal-miners of Newcastle and the boot-makers of Sydney are on strike at the present time. Who will win in the struggle does not yet appear, but it does appear that whichever side wins the public will lose. Newcastle has not yet recovered from the disastrous effect of former strikes, and now more trade will be driven away from it.

"Grads" and "Undergrads" on Strike.

In the way of strikes the Sydney University has afforded us a new sensation. It is the custom of the festive youths who are supposed to be imbibing culture at the Australian universities to celebrate the annual "Commencement" after their own fashion. When the dons and all the other university big-wigs are assembled, likewise, in addition, "everybody who is anybody," and when in the presence of this congregated mass of learning and fashion the "grads" and "undergrads" go up the dais to be presented to the chancellor and receive their honors, then do the students give a practical exhibition of their idea of refined enjoyment. Amidst the waving of grotesque banners, the squeaking of miniature trumpets, the yelling of topical songs (not always too flattering to the university authorities) and the banging of crackers do the honor-men make their bows and the university orators make their speeches. This year there went forth a decree that no songs should be sung and, moreover, that there should be no procession to the place of meeting. As a consequence the students, with very few exceptions, refrained from attending the Commencement, and each honor-man, immediately upon being presented to the vice-chancellor, retired from the meeting.

Hospital Saturday.

In April, for the third time, the annual "Hospital Saturday" collections were held. The result (which goes to the maintenance of the sick in the hospitals) will be about £4,000. Scores of thousands of coins have gone to make up this amount. In some cases the contributors have given postage stamps and train and bus tickets, which are negotiable articles. The greater part of the sum has been collected in the streets, and in most instances the collectors have been ladies. In a few establishments the work people have made collections, and much more might have been realized if those employed in business houses had taken up the matter more generally and more heartily. The lady collectors were posted at every available corner in the city and suburbs. Hiding was impossible in this case, therefore the prudent man, foreseeing the evil, went to the bank on the day before Hospital Saturday and provided himself with a pocketful of pennies and threepenny bits. The general testimony of the collectors is that, proportionately, the poor were the more liberal givers.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

Prof. Levi L. Paine of Bangor Seminary, in his article on New England Trinitarianism in the June New World, agrees substantially with Professor Fisher in the belief that, as Professor Paine puts it, "the Sabellian leaven of Emmons and Stuart did its work thoroughly, and New England Trinitarianism through all veins became inoculated with its virus. Perhaps the most notable fact of all is that neither Emmons nor Stuart was conscious of any Sabellianizing tendency, and that their Trinitarian successors today seem equally unconscious of it." Admirers of Joseph Cook, disciples of Dr. Lyman Abbott and friends of Dr. A. H. Bradford will be interested to know that their type of doctrine respecting the Trinity is, in Professor Paine's estimation, "nearer to that of Sabellius himself than any other of recent times." Mr. Cook will not be pleased to know that "his lectures are a travesty on historical Christianity" and his doctrine is "hybrid Unitarianism," and Drs. Abbott and Bradford may object to having it said that "their Trinitarianism is merely nominal." Professor Paine believes that we have come to a critical turning point in the history of Trinitarianism: "The old cycle has run itself out and a new cycle must inevitably begin," and he sees a drift toward a doctrine of man's consubstantiality with God reflected in the books of such men as Phillips Brooks, G. A. Gordon and J. M. Whiton.

The Union Signal, the organ of the W. C. T. U., is grieved beyond measure that the Prohibition party should, upon the ground of expediency, have seen fit to drop the woman suffrage plank. "The rum power has little to fear from prohibition which is not re-enforced by woman's ballot."

Dr. H. M. Field of The Evangelist thanks God he lived to see the Presbyterian General Assembly, which has just adjourned. The outcome, he declares, is a victory for both sides, hence all the better.——The Christian Register (Unitarian) says that even in the strongest churches of that denomination the congregations are made up chiefly of the middle-aged or the old. The same is also true of her conferences. "If this goes on, what is the hope of our future?"

The Independent is optimistic: "The time will come chiefly, we believe, by further atrophy of Roman doctrine and practice, by further slow reformation, when the church whose chief bishop resides at Rome will be in a condition to recognize and fellowship Protestant churches; and it is with a view to that time that Mr. Gladstone wishes no unnecessary obstacle put in the way. Union is impossible and undesirable now; but it must be kept in view."

Prof. George H. Howison of the University of California, in the June New World, in a masterly way sets forth what he believes to be The Limits of Evolution as a philosophy. He expresses the surprise of an impartial philosophical observer "at seeing official teachers of the Christian religion so strangely oblivious of the real bearings of the evolutionary philosophy as to accept—nay, sometimes proclaim—an evolution unlimited with respect to man as consistent with their faith." Whereas, as Professor Howison asserts, "Plain in the doctrinal firmament of every Christian, clear like the sun in the sky, should shine the warning, unless there is real man underived from nature, unless there is a rational or spiritual man independent of the natural man and legislatively sovereign over entire nature, then the Eternal is not a person, there is no God and our faith is vain."

ABROAD.

The June Expositor is valuable for a critique of Wendt and his theology by Rev. Dr. James Stalker, who says: "The final question is whether this figure presented by Wendt, and presented confidently by an increasing school in Germany, can be the veritable picture of Christ—the figure of One who had no pre-existence, but was the son of Joseph and Mary; who knew some secrets of the medical art and by means of these healed the sick, but did not raise Jairus's daughter, or the widow's son, or the brother of the sisters of Bethany, who taught the words of eternal life, but was not himself rescued from the power of the grave? Is this the authentic portrait of Jesus Christ? It is totally unlike the image presented by the gospel of St. Mark as a whole. But, even if St. Mark did offer it—or any skillfully excerpted section of St. Mark—would it be credible? In my opinion it would be utterly incredible. . . . If Christianity from the very start was founded on a huge falsification, to however innocent causes the distortion of facts may have been due, it is vain at this time of day to attempt to begin it over again. Besides, if Christ was not the glorious Son of God whom the evangelists and apostles represented him to be, but only this figure to which those who agree with Wendt would reduce him, then it is far more evident that it is hopeless to redintegrate the Christian religion upon these terms; for this is not the kind of Saviour that the world requires."

Not all the Scotch are drifting away from Calvinism. Here is the Edinburgh Evening News saying: "The glory of theology to a Calvinist was that it was not palatable to the natural man. The gospel as conceived by the fathers of Protestantism was not a kind of emotional soothing syrup. The gospel was a message of peace, but in the background were the terrors of the law. In their eyes the Author of the universe was no sentimentalist, but a Being who clothed himself with holiness, righteousness and justice. Calvin would have agreed heartily with Goethe in the declaration that the God of the Bible is the God of nature; in both there is revealed a power which is nothing if not retributive. In his day Butler made short work of the flimsy optimism of deism. A modern Butler would have no difficulty in demolishing the superficial efforts of those muddled clerics who are trying to frame a gospel of culture by piecing together fragments of Christianity and slices of German speculation."

Rev. C. F. Aked of Liverpool, in the Christian World, commenting on the supineness of Britons in view of the shame of Armenia, the tolerance of Cecil Rhodes in South Africa, the recrudescence of clericalism and ritualism at home, says: "We have kept sane—and it would have been more to our credit had we gone mad! Is there not a cause? May it not be true that the heart of the nation is growing hard, its conscience seared by selfishness and sin, its manhood emasculated by its vices? Drink, gambling, impurity—these three, with the hideous lust of gold which the gambling vice embraces, are doing, may already have done, their work, and the craven fear for Britain's safety, which has paralysed her energies, may itself betoken that cowardice which is the unerring precursor of her fall. . . . Wanted—a revival! A revival of patriotism, of enthusiasm for progress, of tumultuous pity and surging love and passionate hatred of all evil things!"

PILGRIMAGE LETTERS.

I. ON THE OCEAN.

BY A. E. D.

New York harbor was brilliant with sunshine on the morning of June 4, when promptly at seven o'clock the steamer Columbia moved out of her dock and pointed her prow toward England. Among her three hundred and forty cabin passengers were The Congregationalist's Pilgrims bound for old world shrines. The great ship moved triumphant in the midst of the busy scene, past craft of every sort, till the tall buildings of the great cities gave place to green shores and beside them flotillas of vessels with white sails swaying idly above a glassy sea.

Soon we moved out into the solemn silences of the deep, where the splendid ship, with her broad decks covered with a gay company, seemed an intrusion. Yet to the talk and laughter came no answer other than constant smiles from sea and sky. Some, however, too soon grew tired of the monotony of the summer stillness and wished the wind might blow. They had their wish. Fog and rain and rolling waves drove the amateur travelers to their staterooms and to meditations which frequently broke forth in audible renunciation of possessions too eagerly received, too briefly held. The blow was a short one and mercifully light. Sunday afternoon a fine audience gathered to listen to a helpful sermon from Bishop Potter of New York, from Ps. 139: 4. The bishop told the company of travelers from their homes to foreign lands that though they might escape the cares of business, two things would remain with them, the consciousness of self and the consciousness of God. Our highest dignity is to accept gladly the responsibilities which God places on us through our gifts and opportunities.

A journey across the Atlantic in these days offers little of interest to the general public, and this one would not deserve mention here were it not for the company of Pilgrims gathered by The Congregationalist to celebrate its eightieth year by visiting scenes familiar in the history of New England. These Pilgrims, too, have been already described in these columns in the issue of June 4, but many items of interest have come out in the conversations daily held on the steamer's decks. Two names, at least, are borne by direct descendents of the original Pilgrims, Robinson and Soule. Others, also, can trace their ancestry back to the same source, and some cherish family traditions of brave deeds done in the early days of Massachusetts Colony. One lady relates that among her grandmothers of several generations back one was of the company which became celebrated in the building of the church in Essex. After the timbers were raised, the town of Ipswich, to which the people belonged, forbade them to proceed, but three of the women mounted their horses, rode to a neighboring settlement and secured help to finish the building. The three women were imprisoned for a week, when they said they were sorry and were therefore released, but they gained their church and settled a minister. Another lady can trace her ancestry directly back to John and Priscilla Alden.

Nearly all our Pilgrims are of New England blood, but their homes today stretch from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, and not a few of their families have done noble service in planting and maintaining Christian institutions of the Pilgrim type in the interior and far Western States. From others generous gifts have come to Congregational churches, colleges and seminaries. It would have been difficult to gather so large a company more thoroughly identified with interests dear to the denomination which the Pilgrms from old England represented and for which they braved the terrors of the wilderness and planted the greatest of the nations.

In midocean each member of the party received an elegantly engraved invitation, as follows:

The Mayor and Mayoress of Plymouth (Alderman and Mrs. J. T. Bond) desire the pleasure of the company of —— in the Guildhall on Friday the 12th of June, 1896, to meet the "American Congregationalist Pilgrims," from 7.30 to 10.30 o'clock. Evening dress optional. Kindly reply to the Borough Chamberlain, Municipal Building.

Several of the party seek restoration to health impaired by severe and prolonged labor. It is curious to note how difficult it is for a busy professional or business man to learn the art of being idle. He feels that he must make a business of resting and drive it through. He will sit for a little while in his reclining chair till, impelled by conscience to redeem the time, he paces the deck with Puritan persistence, laying up stores of strength for future need. Then he will sit down again and calculate how many more hours he will require to get well. His hardest lesson is to learn that for him idleness is virtue, but nowhere are better opportunities to learn that lesson than in a summer voyage like this. The clouds that float lazily in the sky look down with contempt on his restlessness. They clasp hands and steal after the gliding ship and shake themselves over it in summer showers. Then the sun pours his glory over the glinting waves, the band plays dreamy waltzes, the hum of voices falls lower, we close our eyes because the lids grow heavy and wonder how any one can find it difficult to be idle. The end comes all too soon. In just seven days the Columbia discharges us on to a tug outside the Plymouth breakwater and majestically moves on toward Hamburg.

SUNDAY OPENING OF ART GALLERIES AND READING-ROOMS.

BY FRANCES M. ABBOTT.

It is expected that every person of religious inclinations will find pleasure in attending some form of public worship on Sunday. Worship of some sort is essential, but it is only half of the purpose for which the day was established. Rest was equally emphasized in the old Jewish Sabbath and surely rest was never more important to man's welfare than today. How this rest shall be obtained, in other words, how the leisure hours not occupied by the morning and evening church services shall be spent, is a question that is constantly presenting new phases.

Among the innovations now under discussion is the propriety of opening art galleries and reading-rooms on Sunday. It is a question which did not trouble our ances tors, for the excellent reason that they had no art galleries and reading-rooms to open, but this is not the whole of the matter. When the country was new there was little need for people to seek occupations outside of their own homes. The whole family could find enough to do on the premises. If the younger members went abroad they could, in most instances, obtain admission into homes like their own, for social relations were simple and friendly in those times.

The growth of cities has changed all these conditions. There are now multitudes of young men and women who have gone from their quiet country neighborhoods to the liberty and loneliness of great towns. There is a growing difficulty in obtaining food and lodging under the same roof. What sort of a Sunday home can those young people have who eat in one place and sleep in another. Then there are the other multitudes who belong in the cities, whose homes are of a kind that the less one stays in them the better. Can any uplifting influence be brought to the inhabitants of the slums?

All of our large cities have art galleries, museums and reading-rooms. Most of them have hitherto been closed on the one day of the week when they could be visited by the greatest number. The contents of these great buildings have remained an unknown good to any but professional students, tourists and people of leisure and refinement. This a selfish hoarding and seclusion of priceless benefits from those who most need them. It is a deliberate starving of the higher nature, which, with the most favored of us, has too little chance among the briers and thorns of this workaday world.

The Americans are a busy people. Even the fairly educated are densely ignorant of art. The beauty and inspiration of noble sculpture and painting fail to reach many lives. In Europe, where art has been for centuries under the patronage of the church, the imposing architecture and glorious pictures of the great cathedrals exercise an unconscious, uplifting influence upon the worshiper hardly less than that of the service. In America we must go outside our churches for works of art, but we ought not to go outside our Sundays.

There ought to be nothing in any of our great art galleries or museums that is not a fit object for contemplation on Sunday. I can conceive of no better place for a person without friends or home to spend Sunday afternoon than in an art gallery, museum or reading-room. There he is sure of a warm, well-lighted room, a quiet, decorous company and the companionship of the masterpieces of genius.

It is gratifying to observe that public sentiment shows a tendency to encourage the opening of art galleries and reading-rooms on Sunday. A clergyman recently suggested in one of the leading reviews that if the opening of these rooms on Sunday were to encroach on the hours of rest of the attendants that there would be a fine opportunity for benevolent people of leisure to volunteer to perform the duty. It would be generous in men of culture to give brief talks on the works of art and the historical collections to those less favored than themselves.

The experiment was tried in 1891 of opening the Metropolitan Museum in New York on Sunday. The result was an attendance of 6,000 on that day against an attendance of 2,000 on week days. I note an increasing tendency among the New England towns to open the reading room of the public library on Sunday. I asked one librarian about the character of his Sunday visitors. He replied that they were few in number, because the library was located in a city of homes, but those few appreciated their privileges. I wondered where those few young men would have spent their Sunday afternoon if the reading-room had not been open.

It is not believed that art galleries and reading-rooms will come into competition with the churches. The former places are not likely to be frequented on Sunday by those who have pleasant homes or by those who have leisure on week days. It is believed that the busy, the poor, the ignorant, the lonely and the homeless ought to have enlightenment and entertainment at the time when they most need them.

The assimilative and unifying power of the Congregational polity finds fresh illustration in an Oklahoma church organized a short time ago. Of the fifty-eight members only one came from a Congregational church, and neither he nor any of the other fifty-seven were reared in Congregational families. This is the kind of raw material out of which the Congregational fabric in the Southwest is being produced. And in most cases it takes on easily and retains permanently the characteristics of the genuine article. A parallel instance to that already cited is another church in the same Territory, the leading mover in which, though not a Congregationalist himself, became convinced a year ago that our polity was best adapted to the community. He secured the names of all the church members in the place, barring a few Methodists, and bought a church building in Kansas, moving it over the line, thus obtaining one of the best edifices in the Territory. Our wide-awake Congregationalists in the newer parts of the country are setting a rapid pace for us in the more conservative East.

Anglo-American Comity.*

By Rev. Washington Gladden, D. D.

There were reasons just after the Revolution for friendship between England and America, as Franklin and Adams both so feelingly testify. First of all the colonists had always felt that the English ministry which they had been fighting did not fairly represent the English people; they knew that few Englishmen had been persuaded to enlist in the invading armies, and that mercenaries from other lands had been brought hither to overpower them; they knew that the Parliament which voted the war was in good part drawn from rotten boroughs, and that the great commercial centers had no voice in it; they knew that the debates on the tea tax, which precipitated the struggle, went on behind closed doors, because the ministry distrusted the people; they believed that the apparent popular approval of the war by English constituencies was largely manufactured by the ministry. They had some good reasons, no doubt, for feeling that the people of England were not all their foes.

Besides this almost every American family, looking back to its origins, found its nest in some sweet nook of merry England, or by the banks and braes of some bonny Scotch streamlet, or upon the green hillsides of the Emerald Isle. A thousand memories and traditions were ever drawing their hearts to that old home; to think of it as the habitation of enemies was unnatural and impossible. Thirteen centuries of English history were their inheritance; Spenser and Shakespeare and Bacon and Milton were their poets and teachers; Marlborough and Cromwell were their heroes; the judicious Hooker, the sturdy Knox, the saintly Baxter, the pithy Bunyan, were their spiritual guides; the same Bible, the same hymns, the same rites of worship, the same household customs bound them to the old land with natural piety. Even then there were reasons enough why the return of peace should have been hailed with gratulations, and why the very thought of a renewal of hostilities should have been put far away from them.

But how many more reasons are there today why such a suggestion should fill our minds with horror. The century that has gone has been diligently weaving the ties of mutual interest; the two nations have been learning together the arts of peace. In all their industrial life how manifold is their partnership; in how many ways is each the servant of the other! The rivalries and jealousies of trade often assert themselves, but how trivial are they compared with the great co-operations of mutual need and interest! How much of the very lifeblood of England is drawn every day from our soil; how much of her busy industry ministers to our daily comfort! In spite of all that is done to obstruct the intercourse of the two nations, each continues to be in a thousand ways the mighty helper of the other. From the harbors of each swift ships are sailing every hour to the ports of the other; a far larger commerce has each of these nations with the other than with any other nation on the earth. What a stupendous sign is this of the vast interdependence of the two peoples, of the extent to which each lives in the life of the other. The social bonds, also, have been yearly multiplying and strengthening. How many English and Scottish homes there are in which Americans have found a gracious hospitality; how many American homes where friends from over the sea are gladly welcomed! This beautiful intercourse is all the while growing; the shortening passage of the stormy sea brings the peoples long separated into closer neighborhood.

The commerce of the intellect, of the imagination, how marvelously has that grown since the days of Franklin and Adams! These are exchanges on which no imports can be prohibitory; the currency of thought, of fancy, passes quickly from land to land. And we may say of the great literature and the great art of the two nations that it is a common heritage. There is no great English book that does not at once find American readers—often quite as numerous as it finds at home; there are few American books of note that are not widely read on the other side of the sea. I almost think that Tennyson and the Brownings are better known on this side the water than on the other, and that Longfellow and Lowell and Holmes are better known on the other side of the water than on this. The names of all the great singers of either land are household words in the other. Can any one compute the contribution to the intellectual and spiritual life of this country which has come during the last century from English sources? Consider the stream of influences which has been steadily flowing through all the channels of our thought and feeling during the later lifetime of those who are now upon the scene—from naturalists and philosophers like Darwin and Tyndall and Huxley and Spencer and Martineau; from prophets like Carlyle and Matthew Arnold; from such masters of the lore of the heart as Dickens and Thackeray and Charlotte Brontë and George Eliot and Mary Ward. Foreigners do you call these? Nay, they are our kinsfolk and familiar friends; they have been the sharers of our fireside joys, the companions of our solitude; they have opened to us the deep things of God; they have told us all that ever we did; they have stirred us with hopes and visions of things unseen. If we have ever had any friends in this world these are among them. Think of what our intellectual lives would be robbed of the sweetness and light that have come to them out of England during our lifetime!

I will not dwell upon the currents of influence that have been flowing in the other direction, although, as I have intimated, they are not insignificant.

By all these larger and subtler inter-relations of thought and art have the peoples of these two countries been growing together during the past century. And those peoples who, in this higher realm, have come to have so much in common; who, as concerning the things of the spirit, are all the while giving and receiving; who, through the medium of a common tongue, are the partners of one another's thoughts and hopes and loves—how absurd it is for them to call each other foreigners! By the deepening communion of these two peoples in the life of the spirit a unity has been created subtler than the toils of diplomacy, stronger than the bands of international law. It is this, for one thing, that makes the thought of war between the two peoples far more horrible today than it was in the days when Franklin and Adams were studying to heal the hurt of the war and to open the paths of peace.

Other considerations easily occur. The tasks of the two countries are essentially the same. The problem of uniting liberty with order and progress with stability, the problem of lifting up the lowly and bringing the gains of civilization within the reach of all—this is the burden that rests today upon the heart of every true Englishman and of every true American. And how much need we have of each other's counsel and experience and sympathy as we grapple with the great questions that threaten our social peace!

This brings me to the one word of deepest moment, to the one overmastering reason why war, which may have been tolerable between England and America 120 years ago, is now, and must forever be, nothing less than a hideous crime. Moral standards are not immutable; with the experiences of the passing generations they are greatly modified. Human sacrifices were lawful and right before Abraham's day; the time came when no miracle could furnish warrant for them. Slavery was Scriptural and holy within my memory; today it finds in our land no defenders. And the ethical changes which have been going on in these two countries during the past century have filled the minds of a great multitude of the people—of the people who ought to control, and who do, I believe, control, the public opinion of the two countries—with judgments and sentiments that must render war between these two nations forever impossible.

Some one has said that no speech is complete in these days which does not contain an allusion to Mr. Benjamin Kidd; and there is some reason for this in the fact that Mr. Kidd has put his finger on the one central force of Western civilization, which is "the immense fund of altruistic feeling with which our Western societies have become equipped." "No student of European history," he says, "can fail to observe that throughout the whole period there has been a gradual but continuous growth of these feelings among the Western races, [and] that they have reached their highest development in the period in which we are living." What Mr. Kidd describes as the altruistic or humanitarian feelings have been marvelously developed in these two countries during the past hundred years. I do not assert that these ideals are novelties, but they have gained a power over the thoughts of men since our war of the Revolution that they never before possessed. Among the leaders of Christian thought everywhere the doctrine of the divine Fatherhood has become the central doctrine of religion, as it was by no means 100 years ago, and the corollary of the human brotherhood has come to have a significance which was far from the thoughts of the men of the Revolution. The enthusiasm of humanity is a new phrase, and it connotes the one great product of human development. Economic forces have co-operated to secure this great result; what Mr. Spencer would call the supersession of militancy by industrialism has been a great factor, but the real power behind it all is the enlarging spiritual nature of man. Humanity is gradually coming to itself. After ages of conflict, as the evolutionary philosophers tell us, we are casting off the brute inheritance; the whole creation, groaning and travailing in pain together until now, is beginning to discover that men are in very deed the sons of God, and that the final law of human relations is not conflict but unity.

"The nineteenth century," says John Fiske, which has witnessed such an unprecedented development of civilization, with its attendant arts and sciences, has also witnessed an unprecedented diminution of the primeval spirit of militancy. It is not that we have got rid of great wars, but that the relative proportion of human strength which has been employed in warfare has been remarkably less than in any previous age. In our own history, of the two really great wars which have permeated our whole social existence, the Revolutionary War and the War of Secession, the first was fought in behalf of the pacific principle of equal representation; the second was fought in behalf of the pacific principle of federalism. In each case the victory helped to hasten the day when warfare shall become unnecessary. In the few great wars of Europe since the overthrow of Napoleon, we may see the same principle at work.

* From an address given in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, Feb. 22, 1896. Dr. Gladden began by citing notable utterances by Franklin and John Adams made soon after the Revolution ended, revealing their love for England and the absence of that bitterness which might have been expected from men with inferior culture.

In almost every case the result has been to strengthen the pacific tendencies of modern society. Whereas, warfare was once dominant over the face of the earth, and came home in all its horrid details to everybody's door, and threatened the very existence of industrial civilization, it has now become narrowly confined in time and space. It no longer comes to everybody's door, and in so far as it is still tolerated, for want of a better method of settling grave international questions, it has become quite ancillary to the paramount needs of industrial civilization. When we see so much as this lying before us on the pages of history, we cannot fail to see that the final extinction of warfare is only a question of time. Sooner or later it must come to an end, and the pacific principle of federalism, whereby questions between states are settled, like questions between individuals, by due process of law, must reign supreme over all the earth.

So witnesses the student of history, the philosopher of evolution. If the sentiments and habits of thought which make war impossible have gained strength in any portion of the world during the last century, it must have been in these two great nations. We need not adopt any extreme theories about the universal wickedness of war. It may be that England and America may yet be compelled to draw the sword—but not against each other. Either of them, as the minister of God who beareth not the sword in vain, may be compelled to execute the judgment of God upon the evildoer. But between England and America there can never more be war. It is not a mere pious wish, it is the statement of what seems to me a moral impossibility. The ethical development of these peoples has already reached a point at which the predominant moral feeling of both of them revolts at the very suggestion of war as the solution of their disagreements.

I do not mean to deny that there are noisy multitudes in both these nations to whom war still seems a pastime, but I say that the moral leadership of both nations rests with those who are incapable of entertaining the thought of war between them. To such an extent have the intelligence and the conscience of England and America become permeated with those humanitarian ideas and sentiments of which Mr. Kidd discourses, so many are there in both lands who see and know that human relations and the laws of conduct are not ethnic, but universal; that the good will which stops at the frontiers is a moral absurdity and a travesty of Christ's gospel; that the Englishman is, by Christ's rule, just as truly our brother and our neighbor as the man who lives next door—so fully have these truths become vital elements of our thought that the hearty consent of these great nations can never again be given to a declaration of war.

England and America know better than to fight each other. They know that there is, that there must be, some better way of settling their national differences than by force of arms. They know that for them, with the light of this century blazing round them—with the ideals of universal brotherhood kindling their thoughts, inspiring their hopes, ringing in their songs, chiming in their Christmas bells—to fly at each other in brutal, brainless warfare would be such an act of infidelity to the highest truth they know, to the noblest ideals they are cherishing, that we might conceive the whole creation standing aghast at the shameless apostasy! War in any shape is horrible enough, but war between these two nations standing in the very light of God, with the more excellent way of peace open before their feet, would be the most stupendous crime of history.

No, we shall have no more war between England and America. That, I do most profoundly believe, has even now become impossible. The outbreak of passion with which the suggestion of war was recently greeted was not the voice of the nation; it was a good illustration of the manner in which the supposed organs of public opinion misunderstand and misrepresent the real thought of the people. The intelligence and conscience of the nation are finding utterance now, and their voice is not for war. But what we want—what we must have—is some solemn pact of peace by which the very possibility of strife shall be put out of sight; some august and permanent tribunal to which all questions that divide us shall promptly go, with the assurance, on the part of both nations, that they will be rationally determined.

Inspired by this high purpose we gather today within the walls where this nation's life began, on the natal day of the father of our liberties and our laws, to send back across the sea an answer to the call for an everlasting covenant of friendship between America and England. And our answer is ready, it is Yea and Amen. It is what the mighty dead would say if their eloquent lips, long silent, could wake the echoes within these walls once more.

When these two great nations, whose united empires span both continents, whose speech is swiftly moving to become the universal language, stand before the world pledged in a sacred covenant of concord, such a call for universal disarmament and universal peace will be heard all round the world as no great nation can fail to hear or long refuse to heed.

Earth shall bless you, O noble emenders
On egotist nations: ye shall lead
The plow of the world, and sow new splendors
Into the furrow of things for seed,
Ever the richer for what ye have given;
Lead us and teach us, till earth and heaven
Grow larger around us and higher above.
. . . . . .
Till love's one center devour these centers
Of many self-loves; and the patriot's trick
To better his land by egotist ventures
Defamed from a virtue shall make men sick
As the scalp at the belt of some red hero.
. . . . . .
And when, in the session
Of nations, the separate language is heard,
Each shall aspire, in sublime indiscretion,
To help with a thought or exalt with a word
Less her own than her rival's honor.
Each Christian nation shall take upon her
The law of the Christian man in vast.
The crown of the getter shall fall to the donor,
And last shall be first while first shall be last,
And to love best shall still be to reign unsurpassed.

MISSIONARIES IN CONFERENCE.

The annual meeting of the International Missionary Union, which for the last six years has met in Clifton Springs, N. Y., has just closed, after a week filled to overflowing with a wealth of material gathered from twenty-two mission lands and from eighteen societies. The American Board, with forty-two missionaries present, exceeded her always large record, while the total from all societies was 127. Our venerable fathers, Drs. G. W. Wood and Cyrus Hamlin of Constantinople, were present with their wives. By request of many a special time between two sessions was arranged when Dr. Hamlin told of the founding of Robert College. The breathless attention and sympathetic applause of the large audience in listening to the wonderful story known to most of them was a high tribute to this wonderful man.

The program pursued the usual order of an early morning hour for devotions, followed by discussions until noon upon various phases of missionary work, the afternoons and evenings being given to addresses upon the different fields. The question box was a new and popular feature. Among topics of special interest was that of the duties of government to its citizens and the position which missionaries should take in appealing to government. The consensus of opinion was that American citizens may stand upon their rights as citizens, as Paul did, but not as missionaries, and that America, having no political interests in foreign lands, is greatly responsible concerning the defense of her missionaries. The Armenian atrocities and the massacre of missionaries in China, both of which were the subject of addresses by those fresh from the fields, added special significance to this discussion.

The distribution of mission funds brought out a variety of opinions, the prevailing one being that natives should be encouraged to take control of their own funds as soon as possible, but not control foreign money. Touching examples were given of the self-denial of converts who, in deep poverty, abounded in liberality. The work of missionary wives and mothers on the field was a subject which brought out remarks by many women, showing how overcrowded their lives are. Mrs. Dr. J. C. Hepburn, speaking from an experience of half a century, said a woman's first duty is to her husband, children and home, and that mothers home on furlough should not feel it so much their duty to go on the platform as to prepare themselves to return in good health to their fields. Dr. E. W. Parker of India said he liked woman's work in missions much until the bishop appointed him to a new field, and his wife, not being able to find any one to take charge of her school, was obliged to remain behind for a year. The subject of sending missionary converts to this country for education, although well ventilated, had but one side in discussion, and that was the undesirability of it as a rule.

The training and examination of missionary candidates was a topic which brought out a suggestion from Dr. W. J. Wauless of India and others that our medical schools should establish a postgraduate course for the study of tropical and other diseases. An hour was spent over the subject of the expediency of individuals, or individual churches, sending out and supporting missionaries. The prevalent view was that it is a great benefit to the church at home, spiritually and financially, to have its own missionary, but that the support for the missionary should be sent through the boards. From the missionary's point of view, also, it is helpful, and puts both parties into close sympathy. Following up a remark by Miss M. W. Leitch of Ceylon, that the women's boards are not in debt as others, because they keep in touch with their missionaries by specific prayer and study, Dr. J. L. Barton brought down the house by these lines:

In the world's broad field of battle,
In the bivouac of life,
You will find the Christian soldier
Represented by his wife.

The question of missionaries remaining unmarried for a specified time was discussed again this year, and Mrs. W. B. Capron's remark, that she should like to share every thing with her husband from the start, voiced the sentiment of the majority. Rev. F. A. Steven of the China Inland Mission said it was the practice of his mission to remain unmarried for about two years, to acquire the language without other cares. The home session brought out a profitable discussion on tithing. Dr. J. W. Waugh of India said that when every person gives one-tenth the whole church will prosper, just as now some few souls are prospering by giving one-tenth. Dr. Caroline H. Daniells of China said there is such a thing as tithing experiences as well as money, and recognizing that the best belongs to God.

Dr. Judson Smith gave in answer to questions valuable information about the present condition of the Armenians. Mr. W. H. Grant, also by request, spoke of conferences of missionary secretaries. The Sunday morning sermon, by Dr. Jacob Chamberlain of India, was a masterly exhibit of the religions of the far Orient, their beauty and their emptiness, as a plea and a reason for their overthrow.

Nearly every mission field was represented some time during the afternoons and evenings of the week. Doubtless all feel what Dr. W. A. P. Martin, president of the Imperial University at Peking, said, that the charm of the week has been the delightfully informal and social interchange of experiences. Measures are being taken by Dr. Foster, the generous friend of missionaries, to place the I. M. U. on a permanent basis at Clifton Springs.

IN THE WOODS.

BY MRS. MERRILL E. GATES.

I love the lowly children of the earth!
I linger 'mid their artless ways
To feel their kinship and their fragile worth,
And catch their speechless praise.

This monk-like moth in close-drawn cloak of brown,
This ant with tireless, nimble feet,
How find they chartered paths o'er twig and stone,
Or odorous pine cone sweet?

The lichens crisp engrave the bowlders old—
Huge fragments of a granite prime—
Of past and present is their long tale told,
Changeful and changeless Time.

The birds' swift-passing shadow and the pines'
Soft-treading tapestries outspread;
The clustered trees, the waves in rhythmic lines
That beat their rock-bound bed—

All woody growths, all wild sequestered things,
Are kinsmen dear I love to own.
I claim the heaven where beat the sea gull's wings
On breezes seaward blown.

A child of nature, that is child of God,
I count these lovely kindred mine.
We, children all, breathe on his bosom broad,
Live by God's love divine!

The benefits accruing from travel and change of scene during the summer, especially for mothers who are closely confined at home most of the year, cannot be overestimated. But there is a class of American women who carry this matter of vacation to excess and leave their husbands at home alone for the entire season to care for himself as best he may. Such women go away, not because there is any imperative need of change, but because the calendar has reached June and they are ready to do anything except to stay at home in a comfortable, quiet, affectionate fashion. They spend the summer in cultivating the acquaintance of people for whom they have only a passing interest, and thereby lose some of the sweetest opportunities for real family fellowship. The German custom of short, frequent outings, when the entire household fares forth together, is far more rational and conduces to the strengthening of domestic ties. The annual upheavals in America, which leave the father stranded for weeks in a desolate house, are deplorable in many of their effects.

A paper recently read before a woman's club had the title: Boys and Girls as Prospective Husbands and Wives. It is to be hoped that it made a lasting impression upon every mother present, for children are too often treated as though they would always be children, and given no intelligent training for the positions that they must be expected to occupy a few years later. We believe that unhappy marriages would be far less common if parents thought oftener of their children as prospective husbands and wives. Family adoration, with a servile acceptance of all moods and whims, however unreasonable, will spoil almost any child; and it is only fair to expect that a boy, thus brought up, will develop into one of those husbands who are spoken of, apologetically, as "difficult to get along with." When a man boasts of the devotion of his family, "If I choose to dine on fire and brimstone, they will cook it to their best skill," no one is surprised that the beautiful girl who loved him should have a married life full of misunderstandings and sorrow. If it were not that they err from the best of motives, it would be difficult to excuse the over-devoted mothers who are responsible for such husbands.

THE HAND OF PROVIDENCE IN OUR MISTAKES.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

The hand of Providence in our successes, our accomplishments, our deliverances is easily recognized by our quickened or grateful perceptions, but less easily and readily, as a rule, do we acknowledge the same kind and wise hand in our mistakes. Yet in most lives the latter equal, if not exceed, the former in the experiences of the passing years. Our motives are so curiously mixed, our foresight is so short, and our limitations are necessarily so many that we are constantly blundering, now turning in this or that direction when another would be the better one to take, now remaining in a place when we ought to leave it, and changing a place when we ought to remain in it, until, as we draw near the sunset, we are fain to bewail our lack of judgment, and wish in vain that we had our lives to live over again. After the event it is often quite plain to us that we should have acted in another way, and we see clearly where we were wrong and what would have been the wiser course of action. But at the time our eyes were holden and we did not perceive the indications plainly.

Especially when our mistakes affect the lives of others, as when parents by a certain decision modify or entirely change the circumstances and future position of children, or as when, at a turn in the road, our stepping to this side or to that arrests our fortunes and gives us the downward push instead of the upward, we are apt to cast the blame wholly on our fatuity and to leave Providence quite outside the reckoning. And, taking this view, it is not strange if we grow cynical and morbid and eat our bread in bitterness and look with envious wonder on the comrade who has outstripped us in the march.

If, however, we accept the sweet and comforting doctrine that our whole lives, from the beginning to the ending, are under God's sovereign control, that while we are free to choose still, for reasons infinitely kind and far-reaching as eternity, the love that outlasts time and sense permits our errors, we shall escape the danger of complaint or weak chagrin. True, we did on some occasions act on impulse and with childish precipitancy, and again, on another, we suffered meretricious reasoning to mislead us, but all the while we were God's dear children and he had not let us go, and there was some need in our nature which even he could not have supplied unless the discipline of life had made us aware of it. There are characters which cannot be developed except by contact with pain and disappointment. There are strong and noble souls which arrive at their full estate only by wrestling against wind and tide. There are exceptional temperaments which would never find God unless driven to his arms by stress of sorrow and desolation of defeat.

Again, it often happens that the last result of an apparent mistake is happiness for the very persons who seemed most disastrously influenced by it at first. Wealth flies and luxuries are abridged, but the sons and daughters, bravely facing poverty, are better equipped for the struggles before them than they would have been had the path been altogether smooth. By a certain decision, regretted and lamented in solitude and silence, we have closed, at one or another period, a door of our lives which we can never open again. When we locked that door we lost the combination, and never in all our immortality can we discover that forfeited secret.

And yet, where for us there would have been, perhaps, joy and ease, there has been instead blessing and the ability to bless, a wider field of influence, a surer sense of power and the going on to a firmer and higher vantage ground. In our mistakes, and, being finite and sinful, we are always making them, let us not be utterly disheartened, since back of them and back of us is the guiding hand of One whose love and wisdom never err.

> Beyond the smiling and the weeping,
> Beyond the sowing and the reaping, as Bonar's lovely hymn puts it, we shall be soon. But even more consolatory is the reflection that beyond these varied experiences, while we stay here, are God's tender care over us, God's purpose for our benefit, God's clear sight for our blurred vision and God's never-slumbering providential love.

AFIELD WITH YOUNG NATURALISTS.

ROSES.

BY MRS. S. S. BUCKLIN.

Roses are true aristocrats. They belong to an honorable and extensive order, rosaceae, embracing five suborders, eighty-seven genera and one thousand species. Many of the families in this order dwell in climates north of the equator and are noted for usefulness, worth and beauty. None have any bad qualities except the almond tribe. A deadly poison, prussic acid, is found in the kernels of the peach and almond. The bark and roots of plants in this order possess an astringent principle useful in medicine. Man feeds luxuriously on the delicious fruit of the apple, pear, quince, plum, apricot, peach, cherry, nectarine, strawberry, blackberry and raspberry. All these may claim kindred with the rose.

Our garden roses date their ancestry back to the single wild red rose, whose five petals have greatly multiplied under cultivation. Botanists describe twenty-four species, from whence have come the numerous varieties. The rose is a shrub, generally with prickly stems, either erect or climbing. It is found as far north as Lapland and Hudson's Bay. Among the wild roses we note Rosa lùcida, the shining, or wild rose, growing in dry woods and thickets throughout the United States: R. nítida, found in New England swamps, with stems covered with a dense armor of reddish prickles; R. blánda, a small shrub growing on dry, sunny hills in Northern and Middle States; R. Carolina, or the swamp rose, forming thickets in swamps and damp woods in Canada and the United States.

The most distinguished climbing rose is the prairie rose, a native of Michigan and other Western and Southern States. Twenty varieties are said to be under cultivation, among them the choice Baltimore belle. The prairie rose is hardy, grows rapidly to a hight of from twelve to twenty feet, bearing large double flowers in clusters, changeable in hue and nearly scentless. The Cherokee rose of Florida and Tennessee is a naturalized trailer from China, with evergreen leaves and white flowers often three inches in diameter. R. multiflora, or many-flowered rose, is a native of Japan, growing South in hedges with the Cherokee rose. This is cultivated in Northern gardens. R. rubiginòsa, sweetbrier, is credited to England and America. It grows in fields and by roadsides. Its small leaflets, when rubbed, are fragrant.

Early in June appears R. cinnamòmea, the cinnamon rose, said to be a native of Europe, now a familiar shrub in old-fashioned gardens. R. canìna, the dog rose, common in Britain, Europe and the North of Asia, produces a splendid class of double and semi-double roses, of which more than one hundred varieties are cultivated. Its long, straight shoots are used to propagate other roses by budding upon them. Its name is said to be derived from the bark of the root, which was supposed to possess the power to prevent evil consequences from the bite of a mad dog. An English writer speaks of R. arvénsis, the white trailing dog rose, as being so frequent in one of the Lanchashire forests as to give it its name, "Rose-in dale." Its trailing habit makes it useful in covering walls and trellises. "The red hips of this rose are of sweeter and richer flavor than those of other wild roses, and are gathered to make a famous cough conserve of which housekeepers are proud. The petals of the dog and sweetbriar roses are more fancied for rose water than the trailing dog rose."

R. centifòlia, the hundred-leaved rose, is a native of the Caucasus and has been in cultivation from very ancient times. Its children are the exquisite moss rose, the Provence or cabbage rose, and the small flowered Burgundy rose. R. álba, the white garden rose, is a native of Germany. Its large, sweet-scented white flowers are easily injured by rain. From R. Indica, a native of China carried to India, and now common in Europe and America, come the Noisette roses, the yellow cloth of gold and other tea roses. Another yellow rose is R. eglantèria, originating in Germany, having both single and double varieties variegated with red. R. gállica, the common red rose of the gardens, is a native of the south of Europe and the parent of hundreds of cultivated varieties. The dried petals are used in medicine and extracts for cooking. The dried leaves of the tea rose are fragrant and are said to be used in China for flavoring tea. The Scotch rose, a native of Scotland, produces small globular flowers of various colors.

The "hip" or fruit of the rose is used in medicine and, in some parts of Europe, is preserved in sugar as an article of food, or dried and used in soups and stews. The hard, seedlike achaenia and bristly setæ are removed. The fleshy covering contains mucilage, sugar, gum, malic and citric acids, tannin, resin and a number of salts. The petals of R. Damascena, the damask rose, yield the fragrant oil called "attar of rose." Great fields of roses are cultivated in the south of France for the manufacture of this perfume, which is literally worth its weight in gold. Ghazipore, a city in Hindustan, is celebrated for its rose gardens, red with blossoms in the morning that are all gathered before midday.

When gathering roses we realize "how full of briers is this working day world!" Every rose is protected by "prickles" or thorns, recurved or straight. Roses deck the bride as she goes to the altar; they rest on the coffin of the dead; they comfort the sick and the afflicted; they carry messages of love; they speak in varied language of grace, simplicity and sympathy, or pride, ingratitude and war; a "bed of roses" is a synonym for luxury, and a "path strewed with roses" indicates a life of happiness and delight. He who looks forth into the future with brilliant visions of unalloyed success peers through rose colored spectacles. An old legend states that "the first rose ever seen was said to have been given by the god of love to Harpocrates, the god of silence, to engage him not to divulge the attachments of his mother, Venus. From this the ancients made it a symbol of silence, and it became a custom to place a rose above their heads in their banqueting-rooms in order to banish restraint, as nothing there said would be repeated elsewhere; from this practice originated the saying, sub rosâ (under the rose), when anything was to be kept secret."

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT SCHOOL.

BY MARY KNIGHT BRADFORD.

Last summer a novel invitation came to one of the stay-at-homes in a large city, which read as follows:

MIDSUMMER NIGHT SCHOOL.

The Woods, July 13. The Hills, July 27.
The Sea, Aug. 13.
8 o'clock. No. — Street.

All who had the pleasure of the acquaintance of the hostess, and were in a hot city rather than in the woods or on the hills or by the sea, came to the Midsummer School, knowing well that something original was planned for their entertainment. They were conducted through the house to a porch beyond, lit with Japanese lanterns and furnished with a table, on which was placed a student lamp, books and papers, besides a great bowl of nasturtiums.

When the scholars had all arrived the host opened school by a few well-chosen words, saying that we might profit by hearing of cool places even if we could not ourselves leave home for three months every summer for rest and recreation. He then spoke of a trip made one summer with the forestry branch of the Government to the White Mountains, and told what he learned about the woods and trees from the scientific men who were making a lifelong study of such things, and how our forests were being ruthlessly cut down, leaving great tracts of land unprotected. This, he explained, was one cause of the devastation wrought by high winds, because they encountered no resistance as they whirl over the country.

Then the talk turned to the pine forests and some choice selections were read, in regard to the pines and their influence, from Mr. Burroughs's charming sketches. Each person was now given a slip of paper on which to write the name of his favorite tree, one bright youth disturbing the decorum of the session by voting for "Beerbohm Tree." Then came recess, and it was found that the midsummer night school was a boarding school, for white-capped maids handed around most cooling and refreshing eatables. At the after session the schoolmaster produced a banjo to the accompaniment of which the scholars sang songs appropriate to the subject in hand. "Hang my harp on a weeping willow tree," "The old oaken bucket," "Hang Jeff Davis on a sour apple tree," etc. After the reading of Bryant's beautiful Forest Hymn the school broke up and, being co educational, the girls were seen safely home.

The night of "The Hills" interesting talks were given by one scholar just returned from the White Mountains, and by another from the Adirondacks. An experience on Pike's Peak and a thrilling account of the first overland wagon train to Oregon were also given.

At the last session, "The Sea," excuses were read from absent scholars, some few of whom had scattered to the woods or hills or sea. One bright letter described life at Chautauqua, another told of the hundreds of pleasure seekers at Ocean Grove, while a third far-distant one described the beauty of the sea from the Pacific coast. A kindergarten scholar, keeping the little school in mind, brought a basket of shells which she had picked up by the sea only a few days before and which were passed around for examination. One of Holmes's beautiful bits was read, comparing the hills and the sea. Byron's Ode to the Sea was also given and then came an examination. Quotations about the sea were read and the scholars were expected to guess who wrote them, and those who answered the Bible, Shakespeare, Byron or Coleridge were nearly always right. Appropriate songs, such as My Bonny Lies Over the Ocean, closed a delightful session of this unique school.

"HIS NAME IS JOHN."

A SERMON FOR THE CHILDREN.

BY MR. MARTIN.

Do you remember our last Sunday afternoon sermon (April 2)? It was about Five Bible Boys. We did not know their names nor, with one exception, anything about them after their boyhood. But the man of this sermon had a name which was very well known then and which has been more common since than any other name in the whole world. We know, too, much about him, from his birth in "the hill country of Judea" to his death in Machærus castle. More than that, we read what was written of him several hundred years before he was born. We learn all we can about the boyhood of Abraham Lincoln, but would it not have been very remarkable if some book written in England four centuries ago had predicted that he was to come and what he would do for his country? That was just the case with this man of our sermon. You can find his whole history in different chapters of the gospels. (If you like poetry, your mother or older sister will read aloud the fine passages about him in Longfellow's Divine Tragedy.) Read especially (Luke 1: 11-13; 59-63) how an angel gave him his name.

One thing you will notice—that Christ said he was a great man, in fact, the greatest man there had yet been. That seems strange. John the Baptist fought no battles. He held no office. He was not rich. He did no miracle. His life was very short. His work lasted less than two years, and in another year the disciples had sorrowfully buried him. But he was "great in the sight of the Lord." It is worth while to see what kind of a man Jesus calls great.

First, then, John was great because he was humble. He did not seek greatness nor honor. He forgot himself and remembered only his duty. Do you remember that grand answer of his when the proud rabbis from Jerusalem came out into the wilderness to question him? I am not Christ; I am not Elijah; I am not one of the prophets. "Who are you then? What do you say about yourself?" "I am no one at all. I am only a voice to speak of Christ. I am not worthy to untie his shoes. He must increase, but I must decrease." When his voice had introduced Christ to the world, saying, "Behold the Lamb of God," he was willing to be silent. True humility is always beautiful. Jesus was meek and lowly and loves the one that humbleth himself.

John was brave—not to kill a lion or fight a giant, but to conquer himself, to do right, though in the face of derision or opposition. Because he drank no wine, people laughed at him and said, "He hath a devil." But he drank no wine all the same. He was brave to speak his message to rich men and great men and bad men. I heard a little story the other day of a poor but brave young man who was working his way through academy and college. All the other boys in his house combined to "cut" a recitation. But he would not join them. They urged him and laughed at him, and then demanded his reason. He answered in substance: "It is not right and I will not do it. You are rich and I am poor. Your fathers pay your expenses. I earn mine by hard work, and I cannot afford to lose a recitation." That was bravery in a little thing, and I could tell you—to his honor—what became of the young man.

One more thing—John was steadfast. He was not a reed shaken by every wind that blew, but rather like that sturdy oak at his native Hebron which had withstood the storms of centuries. What was right for him to do he kept on doing. What was right for the voice to speak it kept on speaking, not only to the admiring throngs in the wilderness, but to Herod and Herodias in the palace. He was "steadfast to the end." Children, make up your mind what is right and stick to it. My heart goes out to the boys who live in the hill country as John did. If you wish to get an education and do good with it do not be ashamed or afraid of being poor, or of wearing camel's hair clothes. Be an oak, not a reed. Persevere and you will succeed.

I remember that this week contains John's birthday. That is, he was six months older than Jesus. So as December 24 is Christmas Eve, the ancient church fixed on June 24 as "St. John the Baptist's Day." That, you know, is the "summer solstice," which used to be observed in Europe by kindling great fires. This relic of sun worship is still kept up, I believe, to some extent in England on "Midsummer's Eve," and is known as "St. John's fire," in allusion to his being called a "burning and shining light." If you attended an Episcopal church that day you heard the prediction in Isaiah and the story in Luke, to which I have referred, read by the minister. But in any church and on any day we can remember that we may be greater than John, for Jesus said that "he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." I suppose that means that although John "prepared the way of the Lord" he knew little of it himself. We know the Way for he is the Way. The least of us can become members of the kingdom of heaven.

A WILD ROSE.

The first wild rose in wayside hedge
  This year I wandering see;
I pluck and send it as a pledge,
  My own wild rose, to thee.

For when my gaze first met thy gaze
  We were knee deep in June;
The nights were only dreamier days,
  And all the hours in tune.

I found thee, like the eglantine,
  Sweet, simple and apart,
And from that hour thy smile hath been
  The flower that scents my heart.

And ever since, when tendrils grace
  Young copse or weathered bole
With rosebuds, straight I see thy face,
  And gaze into thy soul.

A natural bud of love thou art;
  When gazing down I view,
Deep hidden in thy fragrant heart,
  A drop of heavenly dew.

Go, wild rose, to my wild rose dear,
  Bid her come swift and soon:
O, would that she were always here,
  It then were always June!

A LESSON FROM THE OLIVE TREE.

There are so many ways to suffer in this beautiful, sunshiny world that passages like the following, from one of Spurgeon's sermons, are sure to find an entrance into a multitude of hearts:

This fruitful tree seems to bear the mark of suffering. I have called it a ligneous agony, a death-throe in wood. Some of them are twisted and gnarled in such anguish that one would think they had heard the groans of Gethsemane. Well does the olive embody the great agony. The pangs that rent the Saviour's heart in the garden have often been brought before me when resting among these trees.

If you will observe them, not so much the younger ones as those of venerable age, you will compare them to serpents in their strange twistings and coilings. Some of them are split to the very heart and broken from the root upward as with an ax. One wonders how they live; but, indeed, they are full of life. I am told that even the old roots which are brought to us in baskets for the fire would grow if they were buried in the ground. If that be so it would be most difficult work to extirpate an olive tree. It has so much life that when buried in the soil it will send out shoots. Even when it is on the fire it burns with a clear flame, far brighter than that of any other wood, for it is full of the oil of life; and even in perishing it does its best to enlighten those who cast it on the fire.

I suspect that if we care to do great things for God we shall have to become gnarled and twisted by suffering. I suppose that a few good people may possibly escape from trial and suffering, but I do not know them. Those whose lives are very easy are usually of small account in the matter of usefulness. Many who are counting for very little would be all the better for the fertilizing processes of pain and anguish. Even a week or two of gout might cure them of fancies and put them at real work.

Sympathy with others is not learned without personal suffering. The power to comfort grows out of our own afflictions. Depend upon it, those useful workers whom you so much envy have their private griefs which minister to their usefulness or keep them humble under their success. Those whom the Lord honors in public he chastens in private. These sicknesses and sorrows of ours have a fertilizing effect—or at least they ought to have. Every cold wind, as well as every sunbeam, helps to put oil into the olives—and grace into believers.

Closet and Altar

The deepest prayer a human being can breathe was uttered by the Psalmist centuries ago: "O, knit my heart unto thee!"

The sacrament of the Lord's Supper is a very great mystery and it is the means of conveying unspeakable blessings, but the Lord intended that the bread and the wine should first of all win for him his one request that he be remembered. Jesus is not to be for one moment thought of as simply the divinest of all the forces that mold life to God, immanent by his Spirit, but as the Man who ever loves most passionately and hungers most for love. He careth little for monuments; he craveth for hearts. Jesus is only satisfied when the doors are shut to the world, and in a quiet place his friends meet him to keep his commandments.—Ian Maclaren.

Life of all that lives below
  Let thy spirit in us flow;
Let us all thy life receive,
  From thee, in thee, ever live.

O for fuller life we pine;
  Let us more receive of thine;
Still for more on thee we call,
  Thou who fillest all in all.

Live we now in thee; be fed
  Daily with the living bread;
Into thee our spirits grow;
  Into us thy spirit flow.

Communion with God is a great comfort in times of loneliness. We may be separated from our dearest earthly friends, but we can never be separated from our best Friend; his sweet assurance comes, "Lo, I am with you alway." But communion means something more than presence. It implies a confiding interchange of thought and feeling between our Lord and ourselves, a heart to heart conference together, in which we each have a part. We listen to "hear what God the Lord will speak," and, in turn, he waits for our words. If there is no response from us there can be no communion. God said to Moses, "I will come down and talk with thee." And the record stands, "The Lord spake with Moses face to face as a man speaketh with his friend." What could be more personal than this? Just as truly, we may speak with the Lord as we would with the most intimate friend, and he will hear the very words we utter. We may breathe into his ear our deepest longings and desires, our love and praises, our complaints even, and he will answer us in the joy of our heart.—Mrs. C. L. G.

O, Almighty God, who by the giving of the Holy Ghost hast changed the shadows of the old law into the realities of the body of Christ, and by the continual operation of the same thy quickening spirit dost cause thy church to grow and to be profited by thy grace; we beseech thee that all we who have partaken of the flesh and blood of thy dear Son may be filled with the blessed communion of the Holy Ghost and be endowed with his heavenly gifts. Favorably regard the prayers of thy humble servants, and grant that our souls, which are athirst after thy promises, may always be satisfied out of thy fullness through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

Mothers in Council.

THE GRANDMOTHERS SPEAK.

Calling upon a friend the other day, she said: "O, you are come just in time for mother's birthday party." I was ushered into the presence of several delightful old ladies between seventy and eighty-five years of age. Whether my coming depressed them, or the hour was drawing near for the cup which cheers, I know not, but silence fell upon the little company. Feeling in a way responsible and glancing about for some topic more enlivening than the weather, I saw The Congregationalist lying on the table. "What do you think of the Kindergarten for Mothers, reported in The Congregationalist?" The straightening of caps, brightening of eyes and loosening of tongues proved me correct in supposing them all readers of that most excellent paper.

Grandmother Brown said: "O, I thought the reports most interesting and instructive, but isn't it curious that each generation goes over and over the same ground?"

Another grandma said: "I should say as much, and the way those young mothers seemed to swallow Mr. Froebel's talk. Why, a good deal of it is nothing but what my mother used to teach me and she had never heard of Froebel, but she had her share of common sense. She never allowed us to pick flowers to pieces. I remember going behind the barn once to dissect a dandelion, for fear my mother would see me."

"I hope your mother used to punish you for lying," remarked Mrs. Stickney. "This generation calls it having a vivid imagination. Do you recall the young mother who asked, 'What can be done with an imaginative child who hardly knows whether he is telling the truth or not'? If my children forgot to tell the truth they had something to help 'em remember."

A dear old lady with silvery curls and a soft voice now had the floor: "I recall husband's method of curing the habit. Our son William once told a wrong story. It came to husband's ears, and at ten o'clock in the morning we were all summoned from our work to the parlor—only used in those days on great occasions. Husband read the story of Ananias and Sapphira and other appropriate passages of Scripture, and then he prayed—and such a prayer! Poor William became so frightened by his father's appeal to heaven for mercy that he fainted. The children thought he was struck with death for his sin. However, a pail of cold water restored him and he was cured of the habit." (William now occupies the pulpit of one of the largest churches in America.)

Mrs. Burt said the thing that troubled her most was how a busy mother with the care of a house and family could always stop to invent games to divert the children, as was suggested by the Mother Helper as a panacea for all troubles.

"Stuff and nonsense!" said good old Grandmother Blank, "if the children of today, with all their helps, could have the old-fashioned discipline, there might be some hope of them. But the whole tendency of modern training is to make them selfish. It will all come right again in the next generation though, because, their parents being so selfish, the children will of necessity be unselfish and self-sacrificing." Then the old ladies held an animated discussion on the subject, which seemed to be waxing so warm that I ventured to interrupt by asking what they thought of the Mother Helper's idea of not taking young children to church.

"My children were taken to church when they were three years old and they seem to enjoy going now," declared Mrs. Parker, whose three sons were clegymen and two daughters married ministers. Mrs. Plaintalk said: "Humph! pretty work it would make if you took a child for a few moments each Sunday to church, as suggested; folks would have a good time listening to the sermon, with children in different stages of education going to and fro." Evidently the next speaker was deaf, for in a shrill voice she said: "Nervous, indeed! in my day these nervous children would have been punished, and they wouldn't have been called nervous either. I think the mistake of our generation was in bringing up our children to be so unselfish as to wear themselves to shoe-strings in gratifying their children." At this moment tea was announced, and with a little look of delight and expectancy on their faces the dear old ladies smoothed their hair, brushed invisible spots from spotless gowns and passed into the dining-room.

EFFECT OF ANXIETY ON CHILDREN.

A father who has been reading Bushnell is much impressed with what he says on The Treatment that Discourages Piety, and desires us to reprint this passage.

Only to be in the room with an anxious person, though a stranger, is enough to make one positively unhappy, for the manner, the nervous unsteadiness, the worry and shift, are so irresistibly expressive that no effort of silence or suppression is able to conceal the torment. To go on a journey thus with an anxious person is about the worst kind of pilgrimage. What, then, is the woe put upon a hapless little one or child, who is shut up day by day and year by year to the always fearing look and deprecating whine, the questioning, protesting, super-cautionary keeping of a nervously anxious mother.

If the child catches the infection himself he will never come to anything; never dare any great purpose that belongs to a man or a Christian. And if he does not catch it, which is more probable, then he will pitch himself into a campaign of will and passion against all that kind of control, a good deal less rational, probably, than the control itself. Simply to enter the house will raise a breeze in his feeling, and he will be worried and fretted till he has somehow made his escape. Nothing is more opposite to the hopeful and free spirit of childhood, and nothing will so dreadfully overcast the sky of childhood, as the sad kind of weather it is always making. It worries the child in every putting forth and play lest he should somehow be hurt; takes him away, or would, from every contact with the great world's occasions that would give fit schooling to his manhood. And then, since the child will most certainly learn at last how little reason there was in the eternal distress of so many fears and imaginations of harm, he is sure to issue finally in a feeling of confirmed disrespect which is the end of all good influence or advice.

And then it will be so much the worse if the anxiety whose bagpipe melody has been the torment of his early days has shown itself in the same unregulated way in matters of religion. Nothing will set a child farther off from religion, or make him more utterly incapable of sympathy with it, than to have had it put upon him in a whining and misgiving way, in all his moods and occasions. No, there must be a certain courage in maternity and the religion of it. The child must be wisely trusted to danger and shown how to conquer it. A pleasure must be taken in giving him a certain range of adventure, and he must see that his courage and capacity are confided in. And then it must be seen in the same way that his truth, fidelity piety are as much expected as his manhood. In a certain good sense the mother may be anxious for him, burdened in her prayers in his behalf, but she must take on hope and confidence nevertheless, and show that courage in him, as regards all good endeavor, is met and supported by courage in herself.

Good form and true politeness require the graceful acknowledgment of any favor, however small, either by word or speech, and the more promptly this is done the better. A delayed note of gratitude or a tardy word of thanks always misses its opportunity. After a visit, when a present has been sent, a letter of congratulation received, or whenever one has been the recipient of any kindness a note should be written and mailed within two days at the latest after the occasion for it has arisen.

It is not blessedness to know that thou thyself art blessed;
True joy was never yet by one, nor yet by two possessed.
Nor to the many is it given, but only to the all.
The joy that leaves one heart unblessed would be for mine too small.
And he who holds this faith will strive with firm and ardent soul,
And work out his own proper good in working for the whole.

The Conversation Corner.

DEAR CORNERERS: This is the letter that our dear friend, the Despotic Foreman, left out last week:

CLAREMONT, CAL.

My Dear Mr. Martin: Will you send me a certificate? I will send you my photograph to put in the Corner album. Our white rat lived in a heap of stones in the yard for a long time. Then he disappeared. I know our dog Jack did not know where he went, but I am afraid Major P. knew. MIRIAM C.

I wonder if "Major P." belongs to Ned and Frank P., our Micronesian Cornerers in Claremont; if so, it was very unkind in him to trouble a sister Cornerer's pet rat!

The Dakota boy who sent me the photograph of the back side of his head—you remember it in the Corner of March 12—writes:

FT. BERTHOLD, N. D.

Dear Mr. Martin: The pictures in The Congregationalist pleased me greatly. I was eating my supper when the mail came. I hurried to open the paper, and I just squealed with joy when I saw the Cornerers' page. I think I frightened some of the teachers at the table. I caught two gophers today. They have just begun to come out of their holes. The gophers make bad work in the gardens and so we try to kill them off. Papa gives the boys two cents a tail. EVAN H.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: Mary has a cat she calls Kitten Gray. We've got a bird called Cherry and Mary has got a bird named Goldie. I go to the Bridge Street No. 1 Grammar. I take books from the Forbes Library. This is the book I've got, A Boy's Adventures in the Army of '61–65. I can look at the Mt. Holyoke Range. I wish you would visit our town if you have not. We have a horse called Dorothy. Please may I be a Cornerer. I would like your picture. LEWIS C.

I send the picture with certificate of Cornership. I visited your town long before that Boy had his Adventures in the Army, and used to look from, as well as at, the Holyoke Range. I remember the adventures of several boys who once camped out for a night in the woods on Mt. Holyoke!

PATTEN, ME.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am seven years old. What must I do to become a Cornerer?

PHIL H.

Exactly what you have done—ask to be one, and tell your name, home and age, that's all. When you have a live question or learn something of interest up there among the tributaries of the Mattawamkeag, send it to the Corner. This reminds me that an account (March 19) of rafting on the Penobscot called out two letters—the first from a lady in

MAINE.

I write to say how pleased I was at the description of shooting the Orono dam on a raft. I was "born and brought up" near those falls, and my father made and took thousands of those rafts down to Bangor, and I often helped him make the "locks," with which the timbers were bound together, by holding them in the curve to which he bent them while he tied them with twisted birch withes.

VERMONT.

"The logs are coming! They will be here in three days!" I wonder how many of the Cornerers know about the joy with which these words were shouted by the boys, and if they can tell where those logs came from, and for what they are used. I think it would be interesting if some of the Cornerers living on the Connecticut or White River or the noisy Ammonoosuc should tell us about the logs, the "river-men" and the "booms."

Phil's little letter reminds me also of two other things. The first is that I had a call the other day from a Corner boy who lives on the banks of the Penobscot in his county, and who rode to Boston on his wheel, although for a certain part of the journey, over unfavorable country, he substituted car wheels. Have any other Corner wheelmen made a longer trip than that?

The other thing is that another boy—not in Maine—writes that he wishes to join the Corner, but I am obliged to say that I cannot send him a certificate. Why? Because he does not give his name! Every week I receive letters from boys or girls—or men and women—who do not sign their names, or only in part, as Charlie X., or Carrie Y., or Mrs. Z. Of course I cannot reply to their letters or use them. As you know, I do not print the full name in the Corner, but it is necessary to have it. So that if correspondents fail to receive a reply or see their letters in the Corner, they may remember that they forgot to sign them!

COLLECTIONS.

If you will refer to the Corner of May 14, you will note the suggestion as to addresses of Corner Collectors who would like to make exchanges with each other. The address of the boys there mentioned is: Ernest A. Lincoln and Ralph H. Lincoln, Fall River, Mass. I have other letters in the same line which will explain themselves.

TAUNTON, MASS.,
48 Tremont St.

Dear Mr. Martin: I read last week's Corner with great pleasure, for I have recently put my small collection of curios into a cabinet, and am now anxious to obtain more. Please put me on the list as interested in minerals, woods and salt water curiosities. I would like some shell limestone very much, if you know of any one from whom I can obtain it. Sea-urchins and corals I obtain every summer.

(Miss) ELLA B. ROBINSON.

Ask some of your friends visiting St. Augustine, Fla., in the winter, to bring you coquina from Anastasia Island. I got a lot of it there twenty-five years ago, but the best specimens are all gone.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.,
206 Wilbraham Road.

My Dear Mr. Martin: The interest displayed by some of the "Cornerers" in their collections awakens my sympathy. I have a few U. S. and foreign coins (not especially rare or valuable), which I wish to get rid of and would prefer to give them to "Cornerers" for face value than to put them into circulation again. If you could direct any Cornerer to me, I should be glad to have him or her get them for the mere sentiment of having them go to some one who is growing up where The Congregationalist is becoming a childhood association. The coins are one, two, three, five and ten cent pieces, and some foreign denominations. THEODORE S. LEE.

Our "honorary Cornerer" is very kind to think of us in disposing of his coins, and no doubt members of the numismatic department will send a "George Washington" to inquire further about it, or, better still, to carry postal order for the "face value" of the coins they would like, with instructions how to send them.

SUMMER PHOTOGRAPHS.

I met a bright looking boy on the street the other day, who stopped me and asked if we were to give a prize this year for amateur photographs. He talked about "films," "snap-shots" and "time-exposures," and even intimated that he would make the trip to my home and take Kitty Clover! So, as the vacation time is near, the Corner repeats its last year's offer of a small prize to the member sending the best photograph of some vacation scene, historic place, or other subject suitable for reproducing on this page. Send short description, if it be necessary, of the picture, with your own name and home address.

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

Plague of the Locusts. An English magazine speaks of this as at present making havoc in the Transvaal and Natal. It must be worse than the squirrels and moths and jack-rabbits, of which the Scrap-book has recently had notes. One cannot help thinking that Paul Kruger, the sagacious Dutch president of the Transvaal, would almost prefer Cecil Rhodes and Dr. Jamieson to those billions of locusts! (It is said that 200,000,000,000 were killed in Cyprus in 1883.) They fight the plague by collecting the eggs. In Natal these extend for sixty miles in an almost unbroken belt, varying from a few yards to seven miles in width. The natives collect (from the holes drilled in the ground where they are deposited) about four pounds a day, at sixpence a pound. A pound is 40,000 eggs. In some places as many as five tons of eggs have been brought in during the season. If any of our collectors in the Entomological Department wish specimens they could doubtless secure them very cheap—if they took enough!

Monkeys Can Work. We usually think of these curious animals as only existing to play and to amuse other folks, but an English miner from the Transvaal tells an interesting story about their employment in the gold mines. He says that one can do the work of seven able-bodied men, and some work much better than men. He first noticed that two pet monkeys who followed him into the mines engaged themselves in gathering up little bits of quartz and putting them into piles, working all day at it and seeming to enjoy it. He took the hint and procured others, having now twenty-four. The pet monkeys taught the new "hands" how to work. They work together methodically, sometimes clearing up the debris on the outside then going down into the mines, and all without quarreling—any more than men would do under the same circumstances.

They Can Light Matches, Too. I have just seen a notice of a Sapajou monkey (Cebus apella) in the Zoölogical Garden at Philadelphia who can strike matches in an expert manner. He always takes hold at the proper distance from the end and so avoids breaking the match, and always scratches the friction end, selecting a rough rather than a smooth surface. Perhaps he learned it from watching young men striking matches to light their cigars. I hope he will not imitate the higher race in using the match for that purpose. We should certainly have less respect for a monkey whom we should see smoking a pipe!

National Nicknames. "Taffy was a Welshman." When the Welsh in London play football, the spectators encourage them by shouting, "Play up, Taffies!" Why Taffy? The patron saint of Wales is David, and that name is very familiar in the country. David and Davy in Welsh become Taffid and Taffy. In the same way the St. Patrick of Ireland gives the familiar nickname of Pat and Paddy to the common people of the Emerald Isle. Sandy means a Scotchman, because an abbreviation of Alexander, a favorite name north of the Tweed. John is a universal name. We call the Englishman John Bull. The English sailors call the Frenchman, in derision, Johnny Crapaud. We often say John Chinaman, and the Union soldier in the Civil War, who was known as "Yank," swapped coffee and tobacco at the picket line with "Johnny Reb." This is a subject you can carry much farther, if you wish to write on Names.

What the Children Say. One of them, three years old, saw a book on the table and asked what it was. "A magazine." "If it is Maggie's zine, why don't you carry it down to Maggie?"

LESSON FOR JULY 5. 2 Sam. 2: 1-11.

DAVID, KING OF JUDAH.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D.D.

We take up again the life of David at the point where he became an acknowledged leader of his people. He stands at the head of the royal history of Israel. Saul was rather a tribal chieftain than a king, but David created a royal city, became the ancestor of a royal line, centered the national life around a civil and religious organization represented by his palace and the temple which he designed. The Redeemer of mankind came of the seed of David. He is of interest to us for this reason above all other Old Testament characters. He appears in this lesson for the first time as a king. In that position, in order that we may understand his mission and his work, we study:

1. David's character. What we have learned of his youth should be recalled. He was the youngest son of Jesse, who was probably the sheik of the village of Bethlehem. His name meant the "darling." Of ruddy complexion and probably with blue eyes and auburn hair, trained to rugged health by life in the open fields, he was a handsome boy and grew to be a favorite with all who knew him. He loved a good song and knew how to sing it well with his guitar. Men became passionately devoted to him and women gave him unbounded admiration. He was generous, quick-witted, brave, patriotic. All these traits are illustrated in the accounts of him in the Bible.

On the other hand, he lived in a rude, brutal age and did many things which we should now condemn in any man. His first marriage was a love match, and he won his wife by killing a hundred men, but when she was taken from him by her father he consoled himself with other wives, who became numerous as his years increased. He cut off the hands and feet of young men who thought they were serving him faithfully and hung their mutilated members over the pool of Hebron, and even in his old age, almost with his dying breath, he charged his son concerning a man who had done him an injury, "His hoar head bring thou down to the grave with blood."

Yet, taken all in all, he was, more than any other man, the ideal Old Testament hero. His impulsive nature was balanced by a cool judgment which matured with experience. His sternness toward his enemies fitted him to rule over a semi-barbarous people and to conquer tribes who respected no power which did not wield the sword. When it is said that his heart was perfect with the Lord his God, what is meant is that he was conspicuous above the men of his time for his devotion to God and for his loyalty to the standard of righteousness as he understood it. We must admire and imitate his virtues and interpret his character according to the light of his age. A better than David is now our ideal, but in some of the manliest qualities David is not surpassed, even now. To those qualities in these lessons we direct our attention.

2. David's trust in God [vs. 1-3]. He had for years carried in mind the knowledge that he was divinely appointed to be king of Israel [1 Sam. 16: 13], but he understood that the responsibility of gaining the place to which he was destined was as important as his duties would be when he should wear his crown. Men are not chosen by God to do any work unless they set themselves with all their hearts to do that work as he would have it done. Saul ceased to be elect when he left off ruling his kingdom for God [1 Sam. 16: 1]. David was a man after God's own heart because he inquired of the Lord what steps he should take to do what the Lord had appointed him to do. Saul and Jonathan were dead, Israel was defeated. David might have assumed command of the army, but that might have brought anarchy. Under providential guidance, sought and gained, he went to dwell among the people of his own tribe, taking all his family and followers, showing that he meant to settle permanently among them.

3. David's assumption of his kingdom [vs. 4-7]. Though God had caused him to be anointed king, he waited for the people of his tribe to choose him. He combined in a singular degree a sense of being divinely commissioned and a sense of partnership with those whom he ruled. No king of Israel ever lived so closely to the hearts of the people as David did. He made them feel that he was governing in their interest and that the glory of the kingdom was as much theirs as his. In this way he drew together the people and destroyed factional divisions by making their common interests most prominent. His policy was one of conciliation toward all classes, while he held firm to the principles he wished them to maintain. He is a rare example of wisdom in winning men to the service of God and leading them to appreciate excellence of character. The people of Jabesh-gilead had a peculiar reason for being loyal to Saul. He had saved them from their enemy in a great crisis [1 Sam. 11.] When disaster came on his house they gave him and Jonathan honorable burial. David appreciated that deed and enthusiastically commended it. They did not respond to his implied invitation to enlist under his banner, but his courtesy prepared them, when Saul's last surviving son had died, to turn to him with loyal support. One of the two chief secrets of David's power was his purpose to rule men in the name and for the sake of God, from whom he received his appointment. The other was his evident disposition to use his position to serve men who accepted him as king. Royal power belongs to every one who serves God for the sake of his chosen ones and serves men that he may please God.

4. David's treatment of those who opposed him. He never abated respect for Saul and his household. Though there was continually a sort of border warfare between Judah and the rest of the tribes during the seven and a half years that David reigned in Hebron it provoked no such enmities that the different tribes could not come together. Abner, the brave general who defended the fortunes of Saul's house, honored David so much that when he became assured that the end of that house was at hand he could turn to the young leader of Judah and bring all Israel to his feet. Fifteen years David waited for the crown which was promised him when Samuel anointed him in his father's house. The brief narrative of those years in the book of Samuel only hints at the anxieties, the discipline and skill, the confidence in the guidance of God and the deep love of the people, by which he was able, at last, to subdue tribal jealousies, conquer foreign foes and lay the foundations of a kingdom which brought Jesus Christ into the world, the Redeemer of mankind, of the seed of David.

During the next three months our studies in the Sunday school will be connected with the history of his life and deeds. If we can bring again before our minds the circumstances in which he lived, the obstacles he faced, the qualities which made him a hero and by which he so learned the will of God that what he has said and done has lived till now to teach men what God is and what a hero is in God's sight, we shall have well spent the Sundays before us and shall have learned new knowledge of the life that pleases the King of Kings.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

ARE A. M. A. SCHOOLS NEEDED IN FLORIDA?

The determined attack recently made under the Sheats Law upon the normal and industrial school at Orange Park has naturally drawn attention to the educational institutions of that State, and leads us to ask what Florida is doing for the instruction of its children and youth. Its school system is new and somewhat crude, but is developing. The census of 1892 records a school population of 144,106, for whom are provided 2,404 schools. For the school year of 1893-94 an enrollment of 96,775 pupils, with an average attendance of 64,138, was reported. There was spent for education $647,174. The State has 2,051 schoolhouses, of which nearly one-fourth are built of logs and less than one-fourth are furnished with patent desks. The schools have usually but one term, averaging in length less than 100 days, and less than half of the entire school population attended an entire term.

The discouraging feature in the situation is found in the fact that those who need educational advantages most receive the least. Of the school population of the State, 64,387, or over forty-four per cent, are Negroes. In his biennial report, Mr. W. N. Sheats, superintendent of public institutions, says of the Negroes, "For the most part there is no discrimination against them in school matters." The facts stated in his own report, however, speak for themselves. Of the 2,404 schools in the State the Negro school population have but 629, or over 400 less than their per capita proportion; while the whites have 1,775, or over 400 in excess of their per capita proportion. In other words, the State supports one school for every forty-five of its white school population, but only one for every 102 of its colored population.

As if these glaring discriminations were not nough an amendment to the constitution has been recently adopted, the purpose of which incidentally, if not primarily, was to deprive those counties having a large Negro school population of a portion of the State school fund, in order that those whose school population is composed chiefly or largely of white children might receive larger benefits. Even this does not satisfy the ardent mind of Superintendent Sheats. In a letter published last fall he said: "Should the courts decide this question, as the people of this State have decreed it shall be decided within our bounds, . . . I pledge myself to lead a movement in this State with the design of so amending the State constitution as to relieve the whites from all connection with Negro education, to cease all appropriations to their schools of every grade only as they are paid by Negro taxpayers."

The hostility of the enemies of Negro education to the Orange Park Normal is its best claim to support. For five years it has endeavored to train up in intelligence and virtue all who have sought its aid without respect to persons. It has especially labored to train competent teachers. During the last year 113 schools, "mostly colored," were reported untaught for want of any one to teach them. The chance of the colored student for even an elementary education is poor enough, but for him a higher education is often nearly or quite impossible; while the white student has the State Agricultural College, the White Normal, the East and West Florida Seminaries, Rollins College, Stetson University, Florida Conference College and other advanced schools, all conveniently located. The colored student has no school of like grade except the Colored Normal and such schools as the Orange Park Normal, founded and sustained by Northern benevolence. Though compelled to close somewhat ahead of time, this A. M. A. school had already done a good year's work. Its enrollment had reached nearly a hundred.

SPREAD OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE MARATHI MISSION.

The report of the Indian Marathi Mission of the American Board for 1895 deserves warm commendation, not only because it records a creditable growth along evangelistic and educational lines and reflects on every page the earnestness and devotion of our workers in this great field, but as an excellent piece of literary work, compiled with care and conciseness, and arranged topically in a convenient and attractive manner. It is provided with map and index as well as tables of statistics.

The year 1895 has been one of manifold blessings in spite of the stringency of reductions. A great amount of evangelistic work has been done with special encouragement in many places. There is not only a readiness but an earnest desire on the part of the people to hear the truth, and opportunities for this line of effort are limited only by the strength and ability of the working forces. The number of persons received into the churches on confession is 153, which is less than in the previous year but just above the average for the last five years. The net gain in the number of communicants is 115, making the total at the end of the year 2,630. It is gratifying to note that the contributions of the churches amount to Rs. 5,770, or Rs. 470 more than was reported last year, although that was larger than had ever been received before. There is one more school reported with an increase of seventy-eight pupils, and there are now but thirty-one non-Christian teachers while last year they numbered forty-two.

Special reports are given from many churches telling of increased congregations, and in some cases a commendable impetus toward self-support. The First Church in Ahmednagar has an average congregation of 450, including a number of the best educated members of the community, and during 1895 received fifty-one persons on confession. The Roha Church, whose membership is largely made up of mission agents with regular salaries, continues to bear its own financial burdens, paying its running expenses as well as a portion of the debt incurred in building. It will be remembered that money was borrowed to erect an edifice in 1894 on the promise of all the members of the church that they would pay the debt by monthly installments of the tenth of their income.

Of educational work in general Rev. E. Fairbank writes: "The call for schools, even in places where there are government schools, surprises me. I feel more and more that a school manned by a good Christian teacher is a real power for Christ's kingdom in any village." Writing of the station schools at Sholapur, Mr. Harding says: "The station schools are perhaps doing most in character building. The boys and girls come from their villages crude and undisciplined, often with serious faults and sometimes it is a question whether, considering their slow improvement and the risk to other children, they ought to remain. Yet in repeated instances we have seen a growing self-control and habits of industry and obedience which have amply repaid us." The Girls' Boarding School at Ahmednagar has had a successful year with an attendance of 182 pupils of whom 163 are Christians, while the High Caste Girls' School in Bombay shows a constant increase in numbers and interest, having this year fifty-three scholars. A new school opened at Satara among a special caste, the tanners and leather workers, has forty pupils. Since the Wadale church was organized in 1890, ninety-six boys and eighty-five girls from the two boarding schools have joined on confession. Of these more than half came from Hindu homes. One could not ask for a more convincing testimony to the influence of our educational enterprises.

We have not space to touch upon the important work which the Bible women are doing, nor to describe the evangelistic tours of the missionaries or the growing popularity of medical work. There are many signs of general interest in Christianity on the part of educated Hindus and the native press, and one of the most interesting phases of evangelistic effort is the personal work of visitation which Mr. Lawson has been doing among the higher classes. He calls it his "zenana work among the men." The report is not without its dark side, which Rev. E. S. Hume presents graphically in these words: "Heavy reductions made 1895 a sad and burdensome year. Much that ought to have been accomplished was left untried, and the work in hand was carried on in the face of anxieties and difficulties that will leave their mark behind for years to come. Disappointment, anxiety and overwork have been our companions for the past twelve months, and the prospect for the coming year is even darker than anything we have yet experienced."

BOSTON SUPERINTENDENTS' UNION.

Berkeley Temple was the center of an enlivened interest in Sunday school work last Monday night at the annual June festival and ladies' night of the union. After an informal reception to members of the International Sunday School Lesson Committee, and the banquet of members and guests, President Hathaway welcomed the large gathering and announced as the speakers Mr. B. F. Jacobs, Rev. A. A. Berle, D. D., Rev. W. H. Davis, D. D., and Hon. S. H. Blake of Toronto. A half-hour of bright and suggestive remarks was thus enjoyed before the more formal exercises of the evening.

At the public service in the auditorium devotional exercises were conducted by Dr. J. R Sampey of Louisville and Dr. Warren Randolph of Newport. The first speaker, Dr. John Potts of Toronto, compared the cost and the worth of the Sunday school, drawing striking comparisons between the early and present opportunities for Bible study. Dr. B. B. Tyler of New York gave the final address on The Relation of the Sunday School to Good Citizenship.

The meeting was happily planned for the eve of the great international convention, and those present naturally profited much from the presence of representatives from remote sections of the country. Besides the speakers quite a sprinkling of international delegates were discovered in the congregations by their badges. The Tremont male quartet rendered selections during the evening.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. DWIGHT WHITNEY MARSH, D. D.

By the death, in Amherst, June 18, of Dr. Marsh a former Turkish missionary and veteran Congregational pastor is removed. He was born in Dalton, Nov. 5, 1823, graduated at Williams College in 1842 and at Union Theological Seminary in 1849, going the same year to Mosul, Turkey, as a missionary of the American Board. While there he took an active part in the excavations of Nineveh. In 1860 he returned to America, and for a time was principal of a young ladies' seminary in Rochester, N. Y. Subsequently Dr. Marsh held pastorates in Owego, N. Y., and Haydenville, Mass., but in 1882 moved to Amherst, where he has since lived in retirement, winning the highest respect of the community.

Condescension is an excellent thing, but it is astonishing how one-sided the pleasure of it is! He who goes fishing among the Scotch peasantry with condescension for a bait will have an empty basket by evening.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

BOOK REVIEWS.

The Threshold Covenant, or The Beginning of Religious Rites, by H. Clay Trumbull. Dr. Trumbull has added to his triumph of research and generalization in Kadesh Barnea and The Blood Covenant a new and still more significant study of the earliest phases of the world's religious life as witnessed by the traditions, usages and language of primitive peoples in all ages and in every quarter of the earth. In the study of his conclusions new light breaks forth from the Word in many obscure and difficult places, and some of our notions of the meaning of acts and utterances all through the Old Testament must inevitably be modified.

His thesis, built up by induction from long study of the phenomena of primitive religion, is that the threshold was the first altar, and that the sacrifices made and the blood spilt at the threshold were the signs and seals of a covenant between those within and those without the house. From this earliest cult, in the author's opinion, the Bible forms of worship and observance have been developed, and from it also, by emphasis upon the lower instead of the higher view of it and by corrupt accretions, the idolatrous religions of the old world grew.

It is an ingenious and happy generalization which shows us the earliest men with their cave dwellings and the fire at the entrance for convenience and protection, which tells us of the continued reverence for the threshold in the little changing life of the East at this day, of the blood welcome at the door for honored guests repeated again and again in greeting of modern tourists from the West (in the case of General Grant, for example), of the human sacrifices at the door to make the walls of the house secure, of tents guarded at the back from thieves who might dig through, but open and unguarded at the front because no thief would be so sacrilegious as to enter over the sacred doorstep, and of a hundred other significant survivals of the primitive reverence and belief.

We cannot here discuss the important and, in its bearing upon Old Testament exegesis, fundamental chapter upon the relation of this threshold cult to marriage, but we must call attention to perhaps the most striking practical application of the theory of the book—its suggested reconstruction of the meaning of the Passover.

It is not that this rite had its origin in the days of the Hebrew exodus from Egypt, but that Jehovah then and there emphasized the sacredness of a rite already familiar to Orientals. . . . Long before that day a covenant welcome was given to a guest who was to become as one of the family, or to a bride or bridegroom in marriage, by the outpouring of blood on the threshold of the door and by staining the door itself with the blood of the covenant. And now Jehovah announced that he was to visit Egypt on a designated night and that those who would welcome him should prepare a threshold covenant, or a passover sacrifice as a proof of that welcome, for where no such welcome was made ready for him by a family he must count the household as his enemy. . . . A lamb was the chosen sacrifice in the welcome to Jehovah. No direction was given as to the place or manner of its sacrifice, for that seems to have been understood by all because of the very term "passover," or threshold cross-over. This is implied, indeed, in the directions for the use of the blood when it was poured out: "Kill the passover," in the usual place, "and ye shall take a bunch of hyssop and dip it in the blood that is at the threshold and sprinkle the lintel and the two sideposts with the blood that is at the threshold." In that welcome with blood there was covenant protection from Jehovah as he came into Egypt to execute judgment upon his enemies. . . . The common understanding of the term "passover" in connection with the Hebrew exodus from Egypt is that it was on the Lord's part a passing by those homes where the doors were bloodstained without entering them. Yet this meaning is not justified by the term itself nor by the significance of the primitive rite. Jehovah did not merely spare his people when he visited judgment on the Egyptians. He covenanted anew with them by passing over or crossing over the bloodstained thresholds into their homes while his messenger of death went into the houses of the Lord's enemies and claimed the first born as belonging to Jehovah. Later Jewish traditions and customs point to the meaning of the original passover rite as a crossing over the threshold of Hebrew homes by Jehovah, and not a passing by his people in order to their sparing. . . . In the passover rite as observed by modern Jews, at a certain stage of the feast the outer door is opened and an extra cup and chair are arranged at the table in the hope that God's messenger will cross the threshold and enter the home as a welcome guest. All this points to the meaning of "cross-over" and not of "pass-by."

If this be accepted as a true account of the matter, it seems to us immensely to uplift and spiritualize the suggestions of the time and to make the Passover far more significant of him who called himself the Door, and said: "I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no one cometh unto the Father but through me"; of whom Paul wrote, through him "we have access in one spirit unto the Father." There will be close examination and thorough resifting of the evidence presented in the book, which seems at times almost too complete for this fallible world, but no one will rejoice more in this close examination and verification than Dr. Trumbull himself, and the conclusions of the book will stand, we believe, in spite of all criticism. Certainly they must be considered by every careful student of the Scriptures. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.00, net.]

BIOGRAPHY.

Two large and elegant volumes contain The Life, Public Services, Addresses and Letters of Elias Boudinot, LL. D., President of the Continental Congress, edited by J. J. Boudinot of the New Jersey Historical Society. Elias Boudinot was one of the strong and trustworthy men of the Middle States on whom Washington learned to depend in his long Jersey and Pennsylvania campaigns. Of Huguenot ancestry and belonging to a New Jersey family of eminence, he saw much of the war as a soldier as well as served the colonies as president of the Congress. The book is largely made up of documentary material, much of it of the greatest personal and historical interest. The letters, many of them written in absence on public business to Mrs. Boudinot, are simple, unaffected, straightforward and affectionate. There is abundant material for the historian and for the patriot. Miss Boudinot has succeeded admirably in showing what manner of men her distinguished ancestor and his fellow-patriots were. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 2 vols. $6.00, net.]

A typical life of usefulness, beginning with personal consecration and opening into large usefulness, is described in The Life, Letters and Journals of the Rev. and Hon. Peter Parker, M. D., Missionary, Physician and Diplomatist, by Prof. George B. Stevens, D. D., of Yale and Rev. Dr. W. Fisher Marwick, D. D.

The child of Massachusetts Congregationalists, educated at Wrentham Academy and Amherst and Yale Colleges, accepted by the American Board as a missionary and having wide views of the work, he added the study of medicine to that of theology and went to China, where he became the father of medical missions, founder of hospitals and first of those who brought China and America into official relations. The story of his life is extremely interesting and historically suggestive. It is one of those missionary biographies, indeed, which are indispensable to the history of American foreign relations, while the spirit of Christian life is present in it everywhere. We hope it may have a wide reading. [Cong. S. S. & Pub. Society. $1 50 ]

Cyrus W. Field, His Life and Work, edited by Isabella Field Judson. This is a full and well balanced life of one of our great American captains of industry. It is the record of a splendid enterprise, persistence and pluck, diversified by great successes and terrible failures and misfortunes. The recognition of opportunity and the faith to carry through a great work in the face of disheartening discouragements has few finer illustrations. The work of the editor is appreciatively, modestly and thoroughly done, and the illustrations and make-up of the book are excellent. [Harper & Bros. $2 00.]

Among the men who have struck the keynotes of recent American history must be reckoned Henry W. Grady, who became famous through a single speech. What must be called an appreciation rather than a biography of him ("interpretation" is the author's own word) has been prepared by James W. Lee. We would have liked a little more biography. It takes Mr. Lee thirty-four out of 106 pages to reach the first mention of Mr. Grady—which is rather too much waiting in proportion to the dinner. In fact, the whole book is diffuse, grandiloquent and disappointing. There is a good portrait of Mr. Grady and perhaps ten pages of description, characterization and genuine biography—the rest is principally whipped syllabub. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 50 cents.]

BIBLE SCHOOLS AND STUDY.

Teachers' Meetings, Their Necessity and Methods, by H. Clay Trumbull. This is a brief and earnest plea and argument for the necessity and feasibility of teachers' meetings, with a practical and valuable chapter on methods of conducting them. No other method counts so much toward the unity of teaching and purpose of the schools as this, and we are glad to have its case so strongly put. [John D. Wattles & Co. 30 cents.]

The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, Harmonized and Chronologically Arranged in Scripture Language by Rev. S W. Pratt. Every book which makes the Bible seem alive with the life of those who are at once its authors and its heroes is useful. This book the author rightly calls "a complete Scriptural life of Saint Paul," and its happy and useful idea is very well carried out. It is not a rival of the well-known scholarly biographies, but will serve to bring the facts upon which they are founded vividly home to ordinary readers of the English Bible. It would be a capital text-book for Bible class work. [Anson D. F. Randolph & Co. $1.00.]

The Holman New Self Pronouncing Sunday School Teacher's Bible. This is an admirable edition of the Bible, with very full helps and appendices, bound in full morocco with flaps and all the modern improvements. By using thin but strong paper even its additions of Bible dictionary, concordance, etc., do not make an unwieldy book. The marks of pronunciation for proper names have been tested in other editions and proved helpful. The type is large and clear and only the frequent paleness of the ink and a frontispiece which we do not wholly like prevents it from being an ideal edition for practical use. [A. J. Holman & Co. $11.00.]

In the form of a leather bound book with rounded corners and narrow form, fitting it for the vest pocket, we have Wisdom from the Book for the Everyday Life of Young People, by Rev. J. R. Simmons. Under the three headings, Concerning Self, Others, and God, are chapters of Scripture selections. We like the form, spirit and matter of the book, only it must be remembered that this piecemeal method of using the Bible is not the only or the best method. [United Society of Christian Endeavor. 25 cents.]

Rev. William Jay Peck sends us A New Catechism of Christian Doctrine for Sunday Schools. We are glad to see a reawakening of interest in catechetical instruction. This is a very simple set of questions and answers, many of them taken or condensed from the Westminster Shorter Catechism, with addition of the Creed and forms of grace before meals and simple prayers. It might advantageously be enlarged and strengthened here and there, but it is at least an effort toward a much needed help for Sunday school work. [Corona, N. Y.: W. J. Peck. Paper, 2 cents each; $1.60 per 100.]

STORIES.

It must be said that Emile Zola's Rome is a tiresome book. Not having the original before us we cannot judge exactly how much of this is due to the translator, whose English is often prosy in the extreme and often amusingly archaic or bombastic, but certainly he must assume the whole burden of the fatuous and exasperating footnotes. The trouble, however, lies deeper than style. In this book, at least, Zola shows himself to be an artificer rather than an artist. He goes about his task in a workmanlike fashion, takes his hero through impression after impression derived from antiquities, historical associations, scenery, ceremonies, personal meetings, to reach a predetermined effect, but the process is mechanical and, as a result, it leaves us cold. There is no real inspiration and there is just enough of that priapian spirit—that habitual consciousness of the indecencies of life which it is not unfair to call "Zolaism"—to disgust the reader. The death scene of the two noble lovers, for instance, is robbed of all dignity and beauty by a wholly unnecessary detail, which is at once ludicrous and disgusting.

As a novel, therefore, and as a work of art, the book seems to us a failure, mechanical, tiresome and degenerate. It remains to consider it as a political tract. On this side it assumes its true proportions and shows the astonishing, if futile, vigor of the author's labors. The hero of the book, a French priest, comes to Rome to defend a work which he has published on New Rome—the spiritual Rome of a Northern thinker's dreams—a work which has been denounced to the church authorities and is about to be condemned. He meets with reprobation everywhere and is caught in a net of intrigue, as a result of which, step by step, he is taught that the pope and church of his dreams is the exact opposite of pope and church in the real Rome of today, that reformative change, real sympathy for the poor, in short, all his hopes and dreams are impossible—a conclusion confirmed at last by a personal interview with Leo XIII., in which we have the strongest picture of the book. Hate, intrigue, adultery, fornication and all uncleanness, spies, poison, hypocrisy of all kinds play their part in the church life of the present according to M. Zola, and, true or false, we do not wonder that our Roman Catholic contemporaries are greatly angered by the book. It is an ex parte and we do not doubt highly colored statement, but it confirms the experience of Luther, Erasmus and a thousand others, that the Roman Church is to be studied to its own best advantage away from Rome.

The contrast between the Northern and Southern dispositions and desires in religion and politics is the best worked out idea of the book, in other respects it is crude, ill-digested, malignant in spirit, but it can hardly be neglected as a factor in the acute historical and religious controversies and discussions of the time. [Macmillan & Co. 2 vols. $4 00.]

In The Damnation of Theron Ware, by Harold Frederic, we are shown how a young, unsophisticated, but apparently earnest and devoted, Methodist minister undergoes a complete moral change in the space of a few months. The story is a sad one and seems to us to have little excuse for being. However, if there are any such vain, susceptible, conceited simpletons as the Rev. Theron Ware is represented to be, they could learn many useful lessons from his career, especially from the way in which wealthy people outside his church showed him favor when it pleased their fancy, and dropped him the minute that they began to find him a bore. The weak points of Methodism are held up to ridicule, and the sharp contrast is shown between the Methodist and the Roman Catholic church. The book is well written, holding the interest throughout, and the conversations are remarkably natural and unstudied. [Chicago: Stone & Kimball. $1.50.]

His Honour, and a Lady, by Mrs. Everard Cotes (Sara Jeannette Duncan). The same qualities of wit, insight and carelessness, which Mrs. Cotes's earlier books presented, mark this story of life in India and England. It is a serious story, seriously, but cynically, told, and the characters grow before our eyes, but they are not pleasant people, most of them, and not even the Nemesis of the ending makes it a wholesome book. [D. Appleton & Co. $1.50.]

Out of Bounds, by A. Garry, is a strong and humorous story of what befell a young man of the best family of an English city when he yielded to a vagrant impulse. That one escape out of the bounds of conventionality brought him experiences good and bad, and the fortunes of his friends and connections were strangely affected by it, as the reader will learn. [Henry Holt & Co. 75 cents.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Gospel Pictures and Story Sermons for Children, by D. W. Whittle. These are brief sermons which begin with a striking illustration and use it wisely and strongly to convey truth. Such titles as The Poison Sermon, The Magnet Sermon, The Candle Sermon will suggest the scope and method of the book. Most of the pictures are very good. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 50 cents.]

The North Shore of Massachusetts, by Robert Grant, illustrated by W. T. Smedley. This is a pleasant little book containing a running commentary on the seashore resorts of Boston Harbor and Cape Ann. It is not a guide-book, but an invitation, suggesting the pleasures and opportunities of the localities along the shore, but leaving the study of ways and means of getting and living there and the details of excursions to other hands. Those who look for close details of either history or geography will be disappointed. It has the local flavor but is not in any sense a book of reference. [Charles Scribner's Sons. 75 cents.]

To the same series belongs Newport, by W. C. Brownell. This, if not quite so lively as Mr. Grant's book, is a more serious, though gracefully handled, study of the conditions of life and pleasure in the most interesting of our summer social centers. There is a useful sketch map and numerous more or less successful and lively illustrations by W. S. Vanderbilt Allen. The unity of the subject and the seriousness of the treatment give it a permanent value as a contribution to the study of American life. [Charles Scribner's Sons. 75 cents.]

Rev. Gideon Aubin of the French Baptist Church, Springfield, has printed under the title Lectures on the Principal Doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church his addresses delivered in Springfield last autumn, which attracted wide attention. They emphasize the differences between the primitive life of the church as revealed in the New Testament and the modern Roman Catholic cult. [Springfield, Mass.: Rev. Gideon Aubin. 25 cents.]

The bound volume (Nov. 1895–April 1896) of The Century Magazine gathers up the wealth of the separate numbers into a sumptuous volume rich in illustration and literature. This particular volume more than maintains the high art and literary standing of the magazine.

NOTES.

—— Prof. Simon Newcomb of the Naval Observatory in Washington and Prof. Francis A. March of Lafayette College were recipients of honorary degrees this year from Cambridge University, England.

—— We are sorry to record the assignment of the old and honored publishing house of Anson D. F. Randolph & Company. Mr. Randolph, the head of the firm, besides his work as a bookseller and publisher in New York for forty-six years, is an author and poet in his own right.

—— Dr. William Elliot Griffis has undertaken to prepare a biography of the late Charles Carleton Coffin. Letters, anecdotes and impressions which would be helpful in setting forth the varied activity of the man will be gratefully received by Dr. Griffis at his address in Ithaca, N. Y.

—— The Bookman is authority for the statement that "three of the most popular novelists contemplate the preparation of lives of Christ. Mr. Hall Caine's intention has been long announced. Mr. S. R. Crockett has written some parts of a projected life, but does not intend to publish it for a long time. Ian Maclaren also intends devoting himself by and by to this task."

—— We have received the address to the Alumni Association of Iowa College delivered by the late President Magoun at its meeting in Grinnell last June. It was Dr. Magoun's last public appearance, and the address is of special interest, not only on that account, but because he had intended to use it as the beginning of a complete history of the institution.

—— The increasing interest in genealogical research finds expression in notes and queries in the newspapers. The Boston Transcript has long given attention to the matter in its Saturday issue, and now the New York Mail and Express has started a like department for which it will gladly receive contributions in the way of transcripts of old family registers and the like from those who are in possession of them.

—— In connection with the anniversary of the Hartford Theological Seminary there were displayed some of the riches of the library, which is probably the best theological library in the country, although not widely known as such. Upon two long tables were shown those editions of the Hebrew and the Greek Testaments which are important for a study of the history of the text. The Hebrew Testaments were arranged according to similarity of text and numbered thirty-five, including such rare specimens as the Complutensian Polyglot, the Bomberg Bible of 1517-18, the Antwerp, Paris and London Polyglot, a complete set of the famous Hutter Polyglot of 1599, the Buxtorf Rabbinic Bible, 1618-19, and many others. Indeed, only seven important editions were lacking in the entire series. A like number would have made complete the array of the important editions of the New Testament, of which thirty-two were shown. Another table contained specimens of the famous English hymn-books, of which this library contains the largest collection in the country. The old English and Scottish Psalters were shown, including the rare one used by the Pilgrims, and made for their use by the scholarly Henry Ainsworth of Amsterdam in 1612, as well as early editions of the hymn-books of Watts and Wesley and Toplady and Newton, and some curious specimens of sectarian hymnody. The reading-room, with its list of 510 current periodicals, also came in for its share of attention, and the special display of Congregational newspapers to the number of twenty-eight—eight of them foreign—was an indication of the activity of the denomination in this direction.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, July 5-11. What We Owe Our Country. Ps. 122: 1-9.

Every one of us owes his country the contribution of a law-abiding, serious and useful life. The truer we are to our Christian vows, the more faithful in fulfilling the work daily committed to us, the purer in thought and more temperate in speech, the better citizens we are. So while we may not ever hold office, or frame political platforms, or devise policies, or be wise enough to settle the financial or tariff questions, we may still be serving our country and helping it to become a more effective instrument in God's hands for building up his kingdom throughout the earth.

There seem to be two classes of persons, widely unlike, but both needing the rebuke and warning which such a subject as this conveys. There are those who are deep in politics, and solely for what they can make. It may be unkind to intimate that among the great throng assembled at St. Louis recently there were not a few who had, at least, the appearance of being eager to foist themselves into prominence rather than to serve the country in unselfish and quiet ways. But it is not at national conventions alone that this spectacle of self-seeking is so disgustingly evident. In almost every town and hamlet the men who aspire to manage the public affairs are too apt to be of this type. What a revolution would be wrought in their own methods if their attitude should be changed so that, instead of thinking how they can use one office as a stepping-stone to a higher, their motive should be actual service of their fellow-citizens.

Equally worthy of condemnation is that class of citizens who care nothing whatever for the affairs of government, who vote or not as they please, who consider politics a dirty mess, who, somehow, seem to think that this country is the favorite of Providence in such a special sense that it can preserve its existence despite all forces at work to overthrow it, and without any effort on their part to counteract those forces. If the conception of their country as just as truly the object of their labor and ministration as their business or their family could be gained by them it would mean the bringing of a tremendously invigorating influence into both national and local civic life.

For all of us the duty is clear to be faithful to the obligations immediately at hand—to attend the caucuses, to vote, to league ourselves with other men who are striving to secure better government, to pray daily for our country, our commonwealth and the city or town where we live. These are commonplace duties enough but general fidelity in them would work wonderful changes. Another unmistakable duty is to know something about our national history and the structure of our government. An unintelligent citizen is likely to be a dangerous citizen. Books are at hand today the use of which will quickly apprize us with regard to the essential facts of our history and the leading features of the national administration. Miss Dawes's How We Are Governed is one of several readable and instructive volumes. It is a shame that so little actual knowledge is prevalent among young people, and among Christian young people especially, with regard to the traditions and the framework of our government.

Parallel verses: 1 Kings 8: 57; Ps. 14: 34; 147: 20; Matt. 22: 21; 1 Pet. 2: 17.

Panics in some of the New York city public schools caused by "the devil-scare" of the pupils have called attention to the high degree of superstition to be found among the elderly, as well as youthful, Hebrews of the East Side.

CONGREGATIONALISTS AT MONTREAL.

PLACE OF MEETING.

The Congregational Union of Ontario and Quebec placed on record, June 10-15, an account of the proceedings of the forty-third annual meeting of its history. Montreal is always a point of interest to many of the pastors, since it is here that they are reminded of their college days at the foot of old Mount Royal. Zion Church, the place of meeting, is a historic name in Montreal, but for twenty years the union has not assembled within its walls. It was a pleasure to view again the many evidences of prosperity which promise for Zion something of her former position of power and influence. The sister churches, too, modestly asserted their claims for attention. Emmanuel and Calvary were reported as doing better service than ever, while Point St. Charles, which was the infant enterprise at the time of the union in Montreal four years ago, has developed into a vigorous institutional church. Since that date another cause has claimed attention, and the members of the union had the pleasure of attending the services in connection with laying of the corner stone of the edifice of the new and promising church at Westmount.

THE DEVOTIONAL SERVICES.

On turning attention to the union sessions the devotional hour, from nine to ten each morning, is first recalled. The attendance was good, the responses hearty and the earnestness marked. The desire to come near to God and to know and do his will was general and sincere. The memorial service was peculiarly impressive, as thought and affections were directed to "our promoted comrades." Three names were specially mentioned, Rev. Professor Cornish, Mrs. Wilberforce Lee and Miss Jennie McIntosh. Earnest tributes of love were placed on the graves of these servants of Christ, and no doubt many fervent resolves were made to give greater diligence to the service of the Master while yet in time.

THE CHAIRMAN'S ADDRESS.

One of the most interesting features of every union is the annual address from the chair. This year it was given by Mr. S. P. Leet, a lawyer of Montreal, on A Neglected Privilege of the Churches. In the course of an earnest address, on behalf of Christian work for young people, the speaker gave some valuable suggestions touching the formative period of life, services and literature for children, and the proper training of teachers and pastors for work in this direction. In the right discharge of this privilege by the churches Mr. Leet sees the solution of the vexed question of church and state schools.

THE ANNUAL SERMON.

Another feature of great interest is the sermon from the appointed preacher. The man of the hour was Rev. William Johnston of Toronto, whose theme was The Larger Salvation. In an able and scholarly address the preacher called for the removal of lifeless forms and creeds from the church, and urged the practical recognition of the gospel in every department of life. The church, it was contended, must seek to affect legislation, not by dictation and authoritative control, but by the salvation of the individual in his every thought and act. Mr. Johnston is sometimes accused of a too liberal theology, but this sermon was freely designated as one of the finest utterances of the union.

FRATERNAL DELEGATES.

It is not often that the union is so favored with visiting brethren. Rev. Messrs. J. W. Cox and John Wood fittingly represented the Maritime Union, and were heartily welcomed. Rev. Drs. Edward Hawes, Smith Baker and F. S. Fitch conveyed the greetings of the National Council of the United States and received a cordial reception. In addition to these greetings the visitors from across the line were assigned places on the program, which were ably filled. Dr. Baker's theme was Christian Experience Necessary in Christian Work, Dr. Hawes's Some of the Characteristics of the Best Church Life, and Dr. Fitch's The Child Prophet. These brethren are assured of a hearty welcome when future visits are made to Canada. Nor must mention be omitted of the excellent reports of the Canadian delegates, Rev. Messrs. E. M. Hill and Professor Warriner, who were greatly enthused and helped by the meetings at Syracuse.

MISSION WORK.

Never perhaps were more encouraging reports received from the home and foreign missionary societies. The treasurer of the former stated that the debt was discharged, and that for the first time in many years there was a surplus instead of a deficit. The treasurer of the latter pointed out an increase of several hundred dollars over the contributions of the previous year. At the public meeting under the auspices of these societies addresses were given by Rev. Messrs. Robert Hay, Eaton, J. P. Gerrie, Toronto, and Hugh Pedley, Winnipeg. Here, too, may be named the address by Rev. E. C. Evans, D. D., of Montreal on the following evening on The Church as a Spiritual Force. And then, coming as a fitting conclusion to the discussion of mission work, was the appointing of a committee to consider the co-operation of the home churches with those of the United States.

"THE AMALGAMATION SCHEME."

The question occupying the greatest portion of time and perhaps the deepest interest of the delegates and pastors was the so-called "amalgamation scheme." Two years ago, at London, the present chairman, Mr. S. P. Leet, introduced a resolution asking for the merging of the different societies under a proposed constitution of the union. As it is, the societies are corporate bodies distinct from the union. At the meetings just closed the question was up for discussion in the societies concerned and some very warm though good-natured debates were held. The opponents of the scheme base their stand on expenses of incorporation, the interference with the independency of the churches and the improbability of obtaining the closer union through the scheme which its supporters desire. A joint committee from the different societies was appointed for the consideration of some method whereby closer union and better mutual co-operation may be obtained.

TOPICS OF CURRENT HISTORY.

In harmony with its past history the union was alive to questions of pressing public interest. A strong resolution was placed on record with reference to the Armenian atrocities, vigorous protests were made against interference with the school laws of Manitoba, practical and sym athetic recognitions were given to the claims of labor movements, and strong, emphatic deliverances were adopted touching prison reform, Sunday observance and the prohibition of the liquor traffic.

"CONGREGATIONAL SHRINES."

Then, when every one was beginning to feel wearied with the close attention of six days' sessions, a stereopticon lecture on Congregational Shrines, by Rev. E. M. Hill, came as a restful and pleasing conclusion. The lecture was valuable, inasmuch as it set before the audience various periods of Congregational history in such a way that they will not be forgotten. The illustrations were good and the descriptions vivid, and though Zion Church, Montreal, was not included, it will long remain as one of the Congregational shrines of Canada for 1896. J. P. G.

PASSING COMMENT.

See an instance where wise denominational loyalty has brought a Wisconsin church which was rightly planted, but weakened almost to extinction by sectarianism in the community, to regain its position. It has now the leading place in the community, is securely self-supporting and a missionary center to a large region.

The good sense of a number of churches is apparent in their live efforts to cancel floating debts now rather than to make the sometimes fatal mistake of delaying until fall. Such success has resulted in several instances that more debts should be extinguished before the summer separations occur.

Congregationalism is just the force which meets the demands of some localities like that in Missouri, which, although provided with religious bodies, feels special wants.

A call to that Concord, N. H., church can almost be considered an appointment for life, its pastorates thus far have been so lengthy—five pastors in 166 years.

It was an appreciative spirit which prompted that action of a Minnesota church member on the anniversary of the pastor's settlement.

The men with whom we can trust riches are such as one whose generosity has lately so gladdened a church in Ohio.

With the approach of the summer months there has been no abatement of effective revivals in Iowa.

Such an enterprising C. E. Society as that in a Middle West town would be "the life" of any church.

THE CONNECTICUT ASSOCIATION.

The 187th annual meeting of the association was held with the Pearl Street Church, Hartford, June 16, 17. Rev. R. T. Hall of Greenwich was moderator and Rev. H. B. Roberts of Torrington, scribe. Rev. Dr. W. D. Love, the pastor of this church, extended a cordial welcome to the delegates, especially extending the good wishes of the city to the assemblage of clerical workers. It was voted to accept the invitation of Dr. T. T. Munger to hold the next annual meeting with the United Church, New Haven.

The retiring moderator, Rev. J. C. Goddard of Salisbury, gave an address on The Congregational Bishop. He said that each denomination had a right to its form of church government, and that there are already bishops in the Congregational denomination, 388 in this State alone. "Every Congregational minister is an episcopos and a presbyteros; the ministers are all bishops and the people all priests. This is Congregationalism and, with apologies to devout souls who differ, that is New Testamentism." The three points of view from which a bishop may survey his office were named as his pulpit, which is his lookout mountain; his study, which is his high tower; and his see, which is his scope, for the bishop's eyes are ever towards the Lord. These three points were treated in a lively and witty manner

At the afternoon session the report of the committee on changing the basis of representation was presented by Dr. Frank Russell of Bridgeport. It provides that all Congregational clergymen attending the association shall be members ex officio, even though they do not belong to any local association or consociation, the idea being that it shall include every Congregational clergyman in the State. The report was adopted. There was a lively discussion over having only one day sessions in the future, the matter being finally left in the hands of the standing committee.

The discussion in the afternoon on Experiments in Readjustment was opened in a paper by Rev. W. L. Phillips of New Haven. The paper was a review of the unrest of the times in religion and abounded in apt references to the peculiar ethics of socialism, littérateurs, the club, the working man's organizations and the Sunday newspaper, with the lessons drawn from them that the rough and rugged men of Drumtochty, given to the world by Ian Maclaren, and those of like nature were the hopeful men of the day. Mr. Phillips spoke at length on the restrictions of Sunday pleasures, condemning the demand for a religion that shall interfere with the enjoyment of the day as little as possible. Out of these different phases of unrest come the problems of readjustment which have recently been agitated in the church. If the pulpit had continued to preach the old-fashioned gospel perhaps there would have been less of this. Along this line the speaker laid many restrictions on the institutional church. Incidentally he paid attention to Professor Herron and other advanced thinkers. He did not disapprove of all of their methods if they were but the means, not the ends. The loss of the position of prophecy and teaching was to be strenuously opposed. He did not believe in giving up everything that the unreligiousness of the age demanded. The discussion that followed was taken part in by a large number of the brethren.

The evening session was taken up in a general informal relation of ministerial experiences, the principal speakers being Rev. J. W. Ballantine, Ridgefield; Rev. Roscoe Nelson, Windsor; Rev. F. T. Rouse, Plantsville; and Rev. B. M. Wright, Kent. Following the opening devotional exercises Wednesday morning, Dr. L. W. Bacon occupied a few moments in presenting the claims of the Armenians, and offered a resolution pledging the Congregational churches of the State to their aid. A resolution was passed thanking the Pearl Street Church for the courtesies extended to the association. The closing paper was by Rev. S. A. Barrett of East Hartford on The Congregational Ministry: Is It Overcrowded? A portion of this paper will appear in a future issue of The Congregationalist. An interesting discussion followed, participated in quite generally. Dr. A. P. Foster of Boston spoke of the good work of the Massachusetts Bureau of Ministerial Supply, and Rev. Dr. N. S. Whittlesey of New Haven presented briefly some facts regarding ministerial relief. Dr. L. W. Bacon moved that the association appoint a committee of three, to correspond with the Massachusetts Bureau, with a view to inviting it to extend its operations into Connecticut. This was voted. This practically settles a discussion of this subject that had lasted for years. E. D. C.

SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS OF CHARITY.

The anniversary of the Ladies' Charitable Society, June 10, was an event of great interest in the history of the First Church, Spencer, Mass. A reception was given the pastor and wife and representatives of the various societies of the church, and during the evening a historical sketch was given by Mrs. J. W. Temple, who has held many offices and been actively identified with the society for many years, and extracts from ancient records were read. The attendance at all these gatherings was large.

The society was organized by a number of young ladies as the Female Literary and Charitable Society, its object being to combine missionary work with intellectual exercises. Its activity was strong from the start. Each year boxes were sent away and besides assistance was rendered to certain townspeople. Later the literary part of the work was given up, and from that time till 1862 the meetings of the society were held at the houses of members.

At the breaking out of the war this society united with the other churches and formed the Soldiers' Aid Association, forwarding boxes and supplies to the army. In 1867 the society reorganized, taking the name of the Ladies' Benevolent Society. At the fiftieth anniversary three of the original members were still living, who, up to that time, had helped in the preparation of boxes amounting in value to $2,000, besides the work for soldiers and home work. Since that time barrels amounting in value to more than $5,000 have been sent away, and gifts in money of more than $1,000 have been made to various organizations. The gifts of the society have been confined to no one field. Home and foreign missions, the sailor, the soldier, the freedman, the Indian, with the unfortunate in hospitals, have all been remembered, and the interests of the town have ever been considered. With passing years the work has broadened, and its demands have called for other societies to take up and share the work. It is hoped that the old society will continue until the close of its full century as flourishing and as great a power for good in the community as now at its seventy-fifth anniversary. G. R. W.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

ME.—Penobscot Conference held its annual meeting at Bangor. Rev. C. H. Cutler preached the sermon. The topics were: Duties of Members to the Churches Where They Belong, Duty of the Churches of This Conference to One Another and the Kingdom, The Divided Church. A committee was appointed to promote mutual fellowship and helpfulness among the churches of the county. Stirring missionary addresses were given by Secretaries Hatch, Gutterson, Daniels and Marsh. The woman's meeting was full and profitable, represented by a triangle—state, country and the world.

Piscataquis Conference held an enthusiastic meeting at Blanchard, many coming several miles to attend. Rev. W. E. Mann preached. Topics were: The Manliness and Nobility of Christian Service, Responsibility of the Laity for the Success of Church Work, How to Gain a Deeper Christian Experience, Nature and Efficacy of Prayer. Secretary G. A. Hood of the C. C. B. S. presented that cause. There was an admirable woman's meeting during the sessions. A memorial service for Father Thayer was held.

Somerset Conference met at Skowhegan. The sermon was by Rev. T. B. Hatt. Topics were: Good Citizenship, The Evening Service, The Sabbath Question, The Use of Attractions in Church Work, Work for Young Men and Boys. The A. M. A. work was presented by Rev. George Moore. Woman's Work in the Conference was the subject of the woman's hour.

Union Conference held a well-attended and profitable session at Albany. Sermons were preached by Rev. C. P. Cleaves and Rev. C. F. Sargent. Topics included The Church Organization, What Constitutes a Well-Organized Church, How Does the Parish Organization Aid the Progress of the Church? What Can the Church do for the Community? Business Methods of the Church, Church Benevolences, Church Services. The church at Hiram was received into the conference and the pastor, G. P. Messett, approbated to preach by the ministerial association. Secretary Hatch spoke in behalf of the Maine Missionary Society and Secretary Hood for the C. C. B. S.

N. H.—The 69th annual session of Cheshire Conference was held, June 10, 11, at Park Hill, Westmoreland. Besides the usual devotional services and reports from the churches which were generally favorable, the following topics were considered: The Holy Spirit for Service, Home Missions and Evangelization, Deadwood in the Churches—What Shall Be Done With It? Interesting addresses were given by missionaries present. A special committee was appointed to take into consideration the expediency of reviving the Dublin church and obtaining the money now in private hands given for maintaining public worship.

CT.—Litchfield South Consociation met at New Preston for its 105th annual meeting. A vigorous discussion on Second Service took place, and the other topic was Sunday Observance.

MINN.—Central Conference met at New Paynesville, June 16, 17, with a fair attendance. The topics were: Help to Outside Churches, Hymnody in Church Praise, The Church as an Educational Factor, The Church as a Religious Factor, Relation of Christian Endeavor to the Church, Sunday School Aims and Methods, Good Literature in the Family, Business Methods in Church Management, Biblical Study and the Missionary Work of the State. The sermon was preached by Dr. J. F. Locke. The country work about Alexandria cared for by the mother church reported progress and increasing interest and especially aroused the attention of the conference. The Christian Endeavor of the conference was reported and in almost every case was found exceedingly helpful. One C. E. Society gave $100 towards the pastor's salary, another had paid for the introduction of electric lights into the meeting house, another cared for the preaching service when the pastor was necessarily absent on other parts of his large field. The home missionary committee gave a model report stating that they had visited personally 13 of the home missionary churches, counseling with them, holding revival meetings and caring for the work. Rev. William Moore, the moderator, leaves his pastorate at Little Falls, to the regret of all, to accept a call to Clinton, Wis.

CLUBS.

ILL.—The eighth annual meeting of the Fox River Club was held in Sandwich, June 16. Dr. J. M. Sturtevant was elected president. At the morning session an address was delivered by Rev. L. O. Baird on The Poetic Principle as Illustrated by the Poems of E. R. Sill. In the afternoon Rev. F. B. Vrooman of Chicago spoke on The Basis of Christian Union.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

Olivet. The career of this church has not been one of uniform advancement, but a better era seems to have dawned. The other churches in Roxbury are exhibiting a fraternal spirit and furnishing as well practical assistance by uniting their representatives in an advisory board. This board has just issued an appeal seeking assistance for Olivet in its work for the 17th ward, where the population of 24,000 consists mainly of the operative class. Olivet is now moving forward on institutional lines to minister more directly to the neighborhood. It is hoped to secure a good building near the church to serve as a center of operations. The pastor, Rev. Donald Browne, 40 Forest Street, would be glad to receive gifts of money or supplies.

Immanuel. Last Friday evening, after the mid-week meeting, Dr. C. H. Beale, the pastor, was given $600 in $20 gold pieces as a token of appreciation by his people for the earnest work he has accomplished in the two years that he has been with the church. Mr. C. H. Paine made the presentation speech. The gratifying features of this testimonial were its spontaneous character and the desire of all the people to have a share in it.

The City Missionary Society is alive to the increasing demands upon it, arising from the growth of that element in the population who are the special objects of its ministrations. Three additional missionaries have just been put in the field, to work, respectively, at the South End, Roxbury and Dorchester.

Massachusetts.

CHELSEA.—First. Last Sunday morning, after the sermon, the congregation was given an opportunity by the pastor, Dr. R. C. Houghton, to contribute to the canceling of an indebtedness of about $900, due to a small floating debt and to some exceptional expenses of the past year. With a slight effort the entire amount was cheerfully and promptly met, and additional subscriptions raising the amount volunteered to over $1,000 were pledged. No sums larger than $25 were asked for, so that the response was very general. The church is now without any outstanding obligations

FRAMINGHAM.—Plymouth. Last Thursday Rev. L. R. Eastman, the pastor, and his people celebrated the 25th anniversary of his installation. The Sunday previous he preached a sermon suitable to the occasion, reviewing the history of his pastorate. The exercises of Thursday were in charge of a committee of the church and the South Middlesex Conference. In the afternoon public exercises were held in the audience-room. Dr. Emrich of South Framingham presided and addresses were given by Dr. S. E. Herrick of Boston, who was with Mr. Eastman at Amherst, Dr. Edmund Dowse of Sherborn, Dr. F. N. Peloubet and many others. In the evening the church gave Mr. Eastman a reception and the parlors were filled with hundreds who came to pay their respects to their friend and pastor. During this period 337 new members have been received, 176 on confession, and the benevolences have amounted to $59,000, which with a few other special outlays make $73,340 outside of current expenses. The pastor has served seven years on the school committee and 23 years as a public library trustee, besides additional efforts of a various nature.

NORWOOD.—Marked changes have characterized the past year in extensive additions for the Sunday school, interior decorations, a new heating system, the transfer of all property and financial responsibility and management to the custody of the church, and the gift of a beautiful Hutchins organ from Mr. and Mrs. G. S. Winslow, supplemented by the presentation of hymn-books by Mr. F. O. Winslow. These gentlemen have also provided for the recarpeting of the meeting house, and with Mr. H. M. Plimpton and others have given liberally toward additional expenses. Good quartet music has been maintained and the general response of the people toward the support and progress of the church has been hearty and generous. Attendance on social and religious occasions has been excellent. Forty-five persons have been admitted to church fellowship. Contributions by the Sunday school and Endeavor Societies have been creditable. Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Morrill, also of this people, are building next to the church a handsome $60,000 public library in memory of their daughter, Sarah Bond Morrill. Rev. C. F. Weeden, the pastor, began work in June a year ago.

LOWELL.—First. The largest and the longest of the church meetings since the beginning of the recent troubles was held on Friday evening last to consider the question of incorporation. The church voted 267 to 183 to become incorporated under the name of "The First Trinitarian Congregational Church in Lowell." The old officers were re-elected with the exception of the superintendent of the Sunday school. Rev. G. F. Kenngott was elected pastor and the trustees were given full power to make such arrangements for public worship as may seem best, thus making it possible to hold service elsewhere than in the leased building. A written protest against the incorporation, signed by 29 members of the "church as it previously existed," was presented by the party which controls the society.

SPRINGFIELD.—South. Dr. P. S. Moxom preached his last sermon before vacation last Sunday, and in the afternoon communion was administered. The choir and chorus, assisted by piano and organ, rendered Gounod's Communion Service. Dr. Moxom sails this week for Europe, where he will spend two months in travel and study.——First. The pastor, Rev. F. L. Goodspeed, preached the baccalaureate sermon at the Rhode Island State College at Kingston last Sunday. The Sunday evening services will be discontinued until September.——North. Rev. F. B. Makepeace received from the primary department last week a pleasant remembrance in the shape of a large bouquet of Jacqueminot roses, a flower for each member of the class. The postponed national flag service was held last Sunday evening, with an address by Dept. Com. W. P. Derby of the Grand Army.

Maine.

WATERVILLE.—On June 7 eight persons were received on confession and one more was baptized. This makes an addition of 40 since the beginning of the year. Others are yet to come. Of these four were, at their own desire, immersed. About eight have been received by letter. The movement was begun by the spiritual work of Mr. H. L. Gale, the evangelist, followed by incessant pastoral work with cottage meetings. There are still increased attendance at church and deepened interest in the church prayer meetings. Rev. G. Y. Washburn is pastor.

LIMINGTON.—This town has excellent opportunities for a work somewhat like that of the Good Will Homes, and Rev. C. S. Wilder and Mr J. R Libby of Portland plan to begin such a work for boys by opening a home if funds can be obtained. About $2,500 are needed before Aug. 4. Already part of the sum is pledged.

BETHEL.—The centennial of the town was elaborately observed recently. Rev. Israel Jordan, the pastor, gave a discourse making an appeal that every home should be worthy of the chosen name, Bethel (house of God).

Rev. C. L. Parker of Ashland, through great efforts to obtain the building fund, is meeting with success.

New Hampshire.

CONCORD.—First. Tablets for the church commemorative of some of its former pastors are proposed, the society by vote inviting such action. Those thus to be honored are Rev. Timothy Walker, D. D., serving the church 52 years, Rev. Asa McFarland, D. D., 27 years, and Rev. Nathaniel Bouton, D. D., 42 years. It is expected that the tablets will be presented by the descendants of those pastors, some of whom are still living in the parish. It is a fact worthy to be chronicled that the church during the 166 years of its existence has had only five pastors, the fifth, Rev. F. D. Ayer, D. D., entering the present season upon his 30th year of service.

STODDARD.—The church edifice is undergoing much needed repairs, including a new foundation and steel covering for ceiling and walls. Measures to improve its sanitary conditions will follow. During the present season services are held Sunday afternoons at the south part of the town.

CLAREMONT.—Repairs on the church building have been completed, and the regular services are resumed. The convenient and commodious appointments of the new chapel have been practically tested and found eminently satisfactory.

JAFFREY.—First receives $1,000 as a bequest from the late I. J. Russell of Hubbardston, Mass. Also $500 were left to the C. H. M. S., and the residue of the property to be divided equally between the A. B. C. F. M., the A. M. A. and the C. H. M. S.

Vermont.

BARRE.—The church has purchased the pipe organ now in use at the New England Conservatory, Boston. It is valued at $5,000 but the church secured it for $1,200, including the expense of setting it up in this place. An addition to the meeting house will be built to accommodate it.

BETHEL.—The church is free from debt, the last obligations of over $700 being cleared recently. To the women much of this credit is due.

Connecticut.

NORWICH.—Miss Lena Saunders, who recently died in New Orleans, went to that city from this State 17 years ago intending to devote herself to work among the Negroes under the auspices of the Congregational Mission Board of this city. But the needs of the Chinese appealed to her more strongly, and her self-denying labors among them earned for her the admiration and respect of many in the city.

MERIDEN.—Rev. Asher Anderson was treated to a pleasant surprise recently. He had been invited to the house of one of his parishioners to tea, after which he and the host went for a ride. On their return he was met by his Sunday school class who had assembled during his absence. He was presented with $90 in gold.

SIMSBURY.—Work is progressing rapidly on the meeting house, and it will probably be completed before fall. The decorations will be especially tasteful and pleasing. The interior woodwork is to be finished in colonial white and the trimmings in mahogany. The seats will be of birch. Rev. C. E. Stowe is the pastor.

BRANFORD.—First. The third anniversary of Dr. and Mrs. T. S. Devitt's coming here, the third anniversary of their marriage and the second anniversary of the birth of their daughter were celebrated by the parishioners in the form of a reception recently. The pastor and his wife were given a purse of $60.

GREEN'S FARMS.—The edifice has been thoroughly cleaned and renovated inside, preparing it for the new carpets which are now being laid. Both the auditorium and the lecture-room are to be carpeted, the whole expense being borne by the C. E. and Ladies' Aid Societies.

EAST HAMPTON.—Rev. C. W. Collier, who has been acting as pastor here with much success, graduated this summer from Yale Seminary, having pursued his studies there at the same time that he was occupying this pastorate.

BRISTOL.—A mass meeting for the relief of the Armenians was held in the Opera House last Sunday evening, the congregation completely filling the building. Dr. L. W. Bacon was the principal speaker, being assisted by the local clergymen.

HARWINTON.—The repairs on the meeting house are now practically completed, and with the new coat of paint which has just been put on the outside make a decided improvement. Rev. William Hedges is the pastor.

NEW HAVEN.—Grand Avenue. The annual dinner of the Men's Cooking Club was held last week, there being a large attendance. The men served and cooked the food.

Rev. G. H. Sandwell of the First Church, New Britain, will leave, July 22, for a European trip of several weeks.——Rev. Mr. Soule's pulpit in Naugatuck will be supplied during his absence by Rev. Austin Hazen.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

LOCKPORT.—First. Children's Day was observed with exercises of unusual interest and of a patriotic character, the national colors being used in the decorations. A feature of the occasion was the baptism of 20 little children by the pastor, Rev. J. W. Bailey.

CORTLAND.—This church has for some time maintained a mission school in the town. On account of the growing interest in the work Rev. B. A. Williams has been engaged to preach at the mission every Sunday evening hereafter and to assist in other pastoral work.

Pennsylvania.

LANSFORD.—First The church edifice has been repaired and beautified at a cost of $500, all paid for, and has recently received 10 new members. ——Second. The church is rejoicing in improvements in its building, in its increase by 24 new members and in the work of its new pastor, Rev. J. C. Handy.

COALDALE.—Second. On June 14 jubilee services filled the whole day, celebrating the freedom of the church from all debt. Rev. R. N. Harris was assisted in the exercises by Dr. T. W. Jones of Philadelphia, Rev. J. C. Handy of Lansford and others. About $1,300 were raised.

PHILADELPHIA.—Central. During July Rev. Drs. J. R. Danforth and Edward Hawes, the former pastors, will supply the pulpit.——Kensington. This church, organized just a year ago, is about completing a new chapel, which is to be dedicated next Sunday.

CORRY has paid $250 on its old debt recently, doubled the attendance at its prayer meeting and Sunday services, made a net gain of 24 in its church membership and expects soon to ordain Mr. S. A. Rennick as pastor.

BRADDOCK.—Rev. H. M. Bowden took his kodak to the State Association and, in reporting the meeting to his church, made the impression more vivid by his pictures.

KANE.—The church edifice, which has been refitted and frescoed at an expense of several hundred dollars, was reoccupied again June 7. A new parsonage for Rev. C. A. Jones is being built.

SHAMOKIN.—The old church building has been torn down and a new one is to be erected at a cost of $7,500.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

CLEVELAND.—The June meeting of the Congregational ministers was held with Park Church, which has a beautiful suburban location on Wade Park. It was an all day meeting, and dinner was served by the women of the church. The meeting was of the nature of a retreat. The Holy Spirit and Prayer were the two topics. The attendance was large and the meeting of great spiritual and practical value. Special resolutions of regret were passed in view of the removal of Rev. H. O. Allen. ——Trinity. On Children's Day the Intermediate Endeavor Society gave the church a baptismal font, which was then used for the first time in the baptism of several children. At the same service the Sunday school gave the church a handsome American flag, attached to which was a white streamer with the name of the church in gold letters. The flag will float from the church steeple on public occasions.——At Plymouth Rev. L. L Taylor spoke on the protection of children, making special reference to the laws against child labor and declaring that the important office of factory inspector should be taken out of politics. He also gave particular attention to Cleveland's many charitable institutions for children, all of which he had recently visited to gather facts.—— Welsh. This strong church in the south end, formerly Newburgh, has received during the first year's pastorate of Rev. T. H. Joues 43 members. Anniversary day was observed June 14, and the pastor presented each member of the congregation with a handsomely bound copy of a new church directory, finely illustrated, and containing a complete history of the church from the time of the early Welsh settlers.——Pilgrim. In connection with the morning services, in which both congregation and Sunday school joined, a special feature was the presentation of gifts by the pastor, Rev. C. S. Mills, to 26 Sunday school children who had been present at church every Sunday for a year. In the evening the pastor spoke to the children of the public schools ——Franklin Avenue was crowded to the doors for the farewell sermon of Rev. H. O. Allen, to whom the congregation are deeply attached. Before leaving for Wisconsin many beautiful gifts and a purse of $50 were given Mr. and Mrs. Allen by the congregation and Endeavor Society. They will be for the present in Rosendale, Wis.

VERMILLION.—Children's Day was made memorable to this church. The children rendered a program that has seldom been equaled in this place. A collection for the C. S. S. and P. S. was taken. Then Mr. Gilchrist, a former member of this church, now of Cleveland, arose and, in a few felicitous words, presented the church with a new organ for the house of worship, the cost not to exceed $1,500, nor be less than $1,000. The offer amazed the audience it was so unexpected and so welcome. Some persons wept, some applauded and all overflowed with delight. It is just what has been long needed and wished for. In addition, Mr. Gilchrist offered to give $100 toward a new piano.

ROCKPORT.—The church rejoices in the new pastorate of Rev. C. W. Rice. The services are largely attended. The women have recently recarpeted and redecorated the audience-room. The Endeavor Society is especially strong and conducts Sunday evening services with great enthusiasm.

The Elyria church has been supplied for the past month by Rev. D. D. Delong, D. D., recently of Arkansas City, Kan.

Indiana.

ALEXANDRIA.—Rev. J. C. Smith, the new pastor, was given a large farewell reception, June 12, at Fairland Disciple Church, which he had been supplying. A great congregation assembled to express goodwill and a gold watch suitably inscribed was presented the retiring pastor. Two hundred citizens and church members signed a statement expressive of the esteem which the community has for Mr. Smith and the regret occasioned by his departure. It was stated that during his ministry there has been a growing union sentiment, and a better state of Christian feeling than at any previous time. The Alexandria church has secured temporary quarters in the Odd Fellows' building and Mr. Smith is securing the cordial co-operation of the friends of the new organization.

INDIANAPOLIS.—Mayflower. Rev. N. A. Hyde, D. D., and family have left the city for Ludlow, Vt., for the summer.——The home missionary tent was wrecked in the great storm of May 27. It was pitched on the western border of Indianapolis, near White River, and was in temporary use by the Union Church. The tent was two-poled, 40 by 60 feet, and accommodated 350 people. Its loss will be seriously felt. The church has found quarters since in a newly completed hall. A lot has been secured and a subscription is being pushed to erect a convenient chapel.

Michigan.

GRAND RAPIDS.—Children's Day exercises were held in all the churches and missions, and collections were taken for the C. S. S. and P. S. and many children were baptized.

CANNON.—The church celebrated its 50th anniversary June 9, 10. It is one of the most prosperous country churches in the State, and is in charge of Rev. R. L. D. Preston.

Wisconsin.

RHINELANDER.—Union, although the first church established in the town, was so weakened four years ago by withdrawals to form Methodist, Baptist and Episcopal churches that many wished to abandon the enterprise. The Home Missionary Society, however, stood by the remnant, and under the pastorates of Rev. W. L. Bray and Rev. J. H. Chandler lost ground has been recovered, and the church is now self-supporting and the largest giver to local charities. A year ago the Church Building Society offered a five year loan of $1,000 on condition that the building be cleared of all other debt. This has been done by an $1,800 cash subscription, and the church celebrated freedom from their debt, June 16, in a jubilee social, attended by over 300 persons.

KICKAPOO VALLEY.—Mr. C. R. Frazier of Yale Seminary will assist Rev. John Willan this summer in caring for four churches recently organized in the upper part of the valley, in Webster, Liberty, Manning and Camp Creek.

PLATTEVILLE.—Deacon R. C. Bennett, approbated to preach by Beloit Convention, is pastor's assistant, devoting his whole time to outlying districts. A quiet revival has added 31 members to this church since March 1.

SPARTA.—This church sustains a missionary society with a membership of 101, with an average attendance of 68 during the past year. Dr. William Crawford is pastor.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

GRANDIN.—In this town among the Ozarks a lumber and mining company has been operating for about 16 years. The town had formerly a Methodist and a Baptist church, but a need was felt for a kind of Christian work that was not being done. Some time since Rev. John Brereton, a Congregational minister, was invited to come and hold services, with the result that a Congregational church was organized. Rev. J. W. Sutherland, D. D., spent his vacation with the church in the summer of '95. When he came away the lumber company had pledged a lot, a parsonage of six rooms and all the material for a church except the millwork, hardware and glass. The material given was first class, and as a result one of the most beautiful little church edifices in the State, costing without the lot $4,500, has been dedicated. One of the features is a reading-room which will stand open every day. On the day of dedication the other meeting houses were closed. Rev. J. W. Sutherland, D. D., preached the dedicatory sermon in the morning. In the afternoon an interdenominational service was held, with addresses from the State superintendent of the Christian Church, the pastor of the Methodist church and Mr. J. S. Ford of Kansas City. In the evening addresses were given by Rev. Henry Hopkins, D. D., and Supt. A. K. Wray. The fellowship of the churches, especially as exhibited by the church of Webster Groves and the First Church in Kansas City, has been clearly manifest in the history of this new enterprise. Rev. John Brereton is pastor of the church.

ST. LOUIS.—Compton Hill. Mt. Calvary Episcopal Church, whose place of worship was destroyed by the tornado, has accepted the kindness of this people and is holding Sunday school and church services here on Sunday afternoon. Rev. George C. Adams, D. D., gave the baccalaureate sermon at the recent Commencement of the State Normal School at Cape Guardean. This, as in the case of Rev. J. H. George, D. D., at the State University the other day, was the first time a Congregationalist has been called upon for this service.

WEBSTER GROVES.—This place is now connected with the city by a new electric road. The cars pass the doors of both the Webster Church and the church at Maplewood, thus placing them about 10 minutes' distant from each other.

Iowa.

PRIMGHAR.—There were 63 additions to the membership on a recent Sunday, making it one of the strong churches of Northwestern Iowa. Many of the additions were adults. When the pastor, Rev. J. C. Stoddard, came here the church membership was only about 25. Since then it has been greatly strengthened and has built and paid for the finest edifice in the county.

KEOSAUQUA.—Rev. C. E. Perkins, formerly pastor of the Unitarian church in Iowa City, has accepted a call to become pastor of this church. Mr. Perkins withdrew from the Unitarian denomination some months ago in order to ally himself with the Congregationalists, with whose belief he is in nearer harmony.

SIOUX RAPIDS.—Great interest was manifested in the special tent meetings conducted by Evangelist Hartsough. Over 400 cards were signed. Many people attended from neighboring towns. There have been 18 additions to the Congregational church since the meetings.

SIOUX CITY.—The churches of the city are united in a great evangelistic effort under the direction of Evangelist Williams. The tent in which the meetings are held, though seating 4,000 people, is crowded every evening. The First Church received 12 to membership at the last communion, nine uniting on confession.

ROCK RAPIDS.—The pastor, Rev. W. B. Pinkerton, has returned after a year's study in the Harvard Divinity School. Rev. J. K. Nutting, who supplied the pulpit for the last few months, has taken up his residence at Hull.

EAGLE GROVE.—Since the resignation of Rev. Walter Radford resolutions passed by the board of trustees and deacons show grateful appreciation of his services as a faithful and efficient worker.

Minnesota.

ALEXANDRIA.—Rev. G. E. Soper has completed a four years' pastorate, during which time the new building has been erected and paid for. The Sunday school and congregations have largely increased and work has been taken up in the surrounding country, four communities being supplied with preaching, all under the care of Rev. G. F. Morton. The country work is a strong feature of this church, and efforts are made to keep the central church in close touch with these communities. At a reception on Saturday afternoon the neighboring communities were represented. On the anniversary Sunday of the commencement of his work the pastor was pleasantly surprised by a résumé of what had been accomplished, read by one of the deacons.

CLARISSA.—This church, organized two months ago, has secured the gift of lots, raised a subscription of $800 towards a building, had lumber donated, is planning to erect a house at once and also proposes to secure a parsonage. The people respond with great liberality and are anxious to secure a pastor. They have been supplied temporarily through Dr. J. F. Locke, by whom the church was organized.

MORRISTOWN AND WATERVILLE.—The meeting house of the former church has recently been repaired and its attractiveness greatly increased. Children's Day was observed with a good collection. A noble band of young people is especially helpful. Waterville suffers from being a summer resort, but the little church reports progress and interesting services on Children's Sunday.

ROUND PRAIRIE.—A vigorous young people's society of 22 members, with an average attendance of 20, is the life of this church. Four young ladies from the C. E. Society recently bought lumber and with the assistance of a hired man erected a booth in a neighboring town, where there was a G. A. R. encampment, and sold lemonade, realizing $53, by means of which they are painting the church.

STAPLES.—At the midweek meeting Rev. D. W. Cram has the assistance of the neighboring pastor for the purpose of drawing a larger attendance. A member of the church, who has left for the northern part of the State, has started a Sunday school. The out-station, Riverside, reports good audiences and increasing interest.

SPRINGFIELD AND SELMA.—Through the earnest representations of the churches Rev. G. J. Buck has withdrawn his resignation and will remain. Several additions at Selma, with a subscription for a church building, are a record of progress.

GRANADA.—The church has been strengthened by a three weeks' series of evangelistic meetings held by Rev. S. R. Van Luven. Mr. Van Luven also preaches at Frazer, a country church several miles distant.

Kansas.

LONGTON.—Rev. J. D. Moore has resigned his pastorate, impaired health requiring that he take a vacation of some months. The church has enjoyed unusual prosperity during his service.

North Dakota.

FORMAN.—Rev. Stephen Williams, the new pastor, is doing an excellent work and is winning the hearts of the people. He also preaches at Rutland, Cayuga and Havana. At the latter place quite likely a church edifice will be erected this season.

CHRISTINE AND HICKSON.—Rev. S. F. Porter, more than 80 years old but strong and vigorous, is doing good work at these places. They have never been able before to have a regular service.

MELVILLE.—Rev. W. J. Isaacs has done an excellent work here the past year and now has a call to a church in Nebraska, but it is hoped he will decide to remain on this field.

ARGUSVILLE.—This field is now being ministered to by Rev. M. D. Reed, a student from Oberlin. He is having good congregations and the outlook is encouraging.

HILLSBORO AND KELSO.—Rev. W. H. Gimblett is assisting Pastor McQuarrie in special evangelistic services.

South Dakota.

PLANKINTON.—The church has received 13 members on confession, the first fruits of the recent meetings. There were eight men and five women, and they bring great strength and encouragement to our church. The men are prominent as business and professional men and county officers, and are thoroughly in earnest in their Christian purpose.

FAULKTON.—This church recently received nine persons into membership. The Sunday school is growing, having increased its attendance somewhat over last quarter. A Union Mission Band, held on Sunday afternoon, comprising the young people as well as children, where missionary topics are studied, is a hopeful feature of the work.

CENTERVILLE.—The Sunday school is building up rapidly. A new library has recently been purchased. Seven persons united with the church June 7, and as many more intend to unite at the next communion. The pastor is much encouraged.

Rev. H. W. Jamison and his wife of Beresford have just moved into a new $1,700 parsonage.

Idaho.

HOPE.—A fire took place here June 14, burning nearly the whole town, including the parsonage recently built. Rev. V. W. Roth, pastor, with his wife and six children, from two to 14 years old, lost everything. They received aid immediately from the Spokane (Wn.) churches, but are in need of much more to make them comfortable.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

SACRAMENTO.—Fifteen persons were added at the last communion. A steadily increasing interest is manifested and plans for more aggressive work are forming. The Young Men's League, formed last fall, is successful, its last gathering for the season being a banquet, the ladies providing and serving the tables. Denominational lines were wholly absent, several of the city pastors participating. Mr. Weinstock, president of the Jewish congregation, spoke upon The Call for a Manly Type of Christianity. Dr. H. N. Hoyt, the pastor, and his family will spend part of their vacation in southern California.

STOCKTON.—The seventh anniversary of Rev. R. H. Sink's pastorate was fittingly celebrated June 8. In that time 155 persons have been added to the membership. Congregations now fill the house. During the most of July the edifice will be closed for repairs, the pastor then taking his vacation.

The choir of the Sonoma church has received a supply of new hymn-books as a gift from Mrs. Craig.——Chandeliers have recently been given to the Beckwith church by friends in San Francisco.

OTHER CHRISTIAN WORK.

The Year-Book for 1896 of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. is just from the press. A summary of the work for 1895 compared with 1894 shows a healthy growth in every department. There are now 1,448 associations, with an aggregate membership of 263,298, of whom 37,823 are serving on committees. The number of secretaries and other paid agents has increased from 1,159 to 1,248, with 63 vacancies to be filled. There are 315 association buildings (an increase of 10 during the year), valued with other real estate owned by the associations at $18,189,300. The annual amount received for current expenses of the local associations and the international and State committees for the year amounted to $2,503,170. The international committee expended $65,305 on the home department and $20,995 on the foreign department, and closed the year free of debt. The young men attending the educational classes numbered 25,886, an increase of over 3,000. Employment was secured for 9,450 persons.

The Old South Historical Society which has in previous years organized various excursions for its members to interesting historical points in Boston, Cambridge and Salem announces this season a historical pilgrimage on July 10 to Old Rutland, Mass., which has been well called "the Cradle of Ohio." An invitation to join the party is extended to all the young people of Boston and vicinity and the round trip may be obtained for $1 75 at the Old South Meeting House or of Mr. Benjamin C. Lane, 266 Devonshire St., Boston.

COMMENDED TO THE CHURCHES.

The exact text of resolutions passed by the General Association of Massachusetts at its Fall River meeting is as follows:

Whereas, The Board of Pastoral Supply, established by this association, has, after two years of service, abundantly proved its value to the churches of the State by bringing pastorless churches and churchless pastors into correspondence with most satisfactory results, and whereas, many of the churches have failed to contribute the small sum—the equivalent of one-third of one per cent. of the usual salary paid to the pastor—for the support of the same; therefore,

Resolved, That the association earnestly request the churches which have not responded to this call to send, forthwith, such contribution to the treasurer, that the considerable amount already due the secretary, and for which no other provision is made, may be paid.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

One of the dullest stock markets of a dull year has followed upon the heels of the Republican convention, where the triumph of sound money was complete. Many are asking why speculation should not reflect the great victory won for gold at St. Louis. The cause is not far to seek. Wall Street leaders do not like McKinley. Although he stands upon a gold platform they know him by his record to be considerable of a silver man, and the man himself is taken more seriously than the platform. Had Reed received the nomination we should doubtless have witnessed a better stock market. Although the St. Louis convention declared so unequivocally for sound money, the silver question still remains the burning issue of the campaign. If the Democrats do not nominate a free-silver man at their convention next month, Henry M. Teller, the silver senator, will probably run on an independent free-silver ticket. There is consequently much remaining uncertainty, and until the battle has been decided at the polls the business interests will move forward slowly.

It can be stated, however, that there is a trifle better feeling among all classes of business men as a result of the overwhelming vote for sound money at St. Louis. Such a display naturally inspires confidence and indicates that the country as a whole is sound on the money question. The fear of kaleidoscopic changes in the political situation between now and November is too firmly implanted to be lightly brushed away.

General trade continues dull. Iron, cotton, wool and dry goods are sluggish and low of price. Goods are piled up awaiting consumption, but in most instances there is no excessive glut and a short period of normal consumption would soon reduce stocks to a very healthy point. Crop prospects are favorable and railroad managers are preparing for a big business, but grain prices are so low that farmers cannot afford to pay the old-time profitable rates to haul the wheat and corn. Other favorable factors are the virtual cessation of gold exports, good improvement in the foreign trade of the United States, the increasing car movement on Western railroads and continued ease in the money market. All these are overshadowed, however, by the political situation, and people in the stock market should exercise more than ordinary caution until light breaks clearer than at present.

COMMENCEMENT AT TWO OF THE WOMEN'S COLLEGES.

The two western Massachusetts colleges for women, situated only six miles from one another, are both growing yearly in popularity, and are being sought by as many students as they can accommodate with their present equipment. The two are also keeping pace in their friendly rivalry to furnish year by year better facilities and instruction for their pupils. And while life at Smith is generally supposed to be somewhat more agreeable to the average society girl, Mt. Holyoke, under its new president, Mrs. Mead, has become greatly liberalized and few restrictions compared with the earlier years of the institution are laid down. Moreover, the modern drift toward more elaborate social functions and a great variety of good times has not failed to embrace South Hadley in its onward march.

The college at Northampton has far outstripped its neighbor on the other side of the Connecticut River in the number of its students, there having been enrolled this past year 875, and the graduating class numbering 151. The alumnæ return in large numbers every year, not less than 200 being in the procession to College Hall on the occasion of Dr. Washington Gladden's scholarly and inspiriting address. The loyalty of the graduates is proved by the enthusiasm with which they labor in behalf of the college. Their library fund has now reached $5,000, while the graduating class has raised not less than $2,600 for a students' building. Next year another dormitory is to be added to the half dozen or more now clustering around the original hall. This new structure is to be the most expensive ever reared, and board in it will be somewhat more costly than in the other cottages or in the city. Private parties are erecting the building with a view to furnishing accommodations for the more wealthy element among the students. President Seelye's baccalaureate was characterized by his customary vigor of thought and gracefulness of expression. The new member of the board of trustees succeeding Miss Anna L. Dawes is Mrs. Mary D. Dey of Syracuse, a graduate of the college.

Mt. Holyoke's graduates number seventy-eight and they were addressed by Rev. Dr. W. H. P. Faunce of New York. The baccalaureate was preached by Rev. Charles M. Lamson, D. D., of Hartford, and there was the usual succession of receptions, Class Day festivals and alumnæ gatherings. It is encouraging to note that $70,000 of the $100,000 necessary to secure Dr. Pearsons's gift of $50,000 have been pledged and the remaining $30,000, it is hoped, will be forthcoming before next January. The twenty-four alumnæ associations over the country are taking, most of them, a heroic part in the movement.

A new professorship is to be established next year, the department of political economy being separated from that of philosophy and history. Miss Annah M. Soule will be installed in the new chair of economics and civics. Joseph Field, brother of Marshall Field of Chicago, has given $5,000 to found a scholarship in English. An infirmary has been completed during the year and a great event has been the extension of the electric railway from Holyoke to the college, securing for the students easy and swift egress to the outer world.

AN ounce of prevention is cheaper than any quantity of cure. Don't give children narcotics or sedatives. They are unnecessary when the infant is properly nourished, as it will be if brought up on the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk.

POMONA COLLEGE AND ITS NEEDS.

The executors of the estate of Mrs. Nancy M. Field, late of Monson, Mass., have contracted to give Pomona College $25,000 towards a permanent endowment fund of $100,000, provided the college secures $75,000 before Jan. 15, 1897, and the whole amount is paid in before Jan. 15, 1900. This proposition, not unusual for these days, is of far more than ordinary importance to this young college. Though drawing its first breath at the hight of the land excitement in Southern California, Pomona is not a product of that excitement. Rather, long cherished hopes, fervent prayers and general plans eventuated in definite action at that time. The churches, by a committee reappointed a year before, after comparing several proposed locations, made their choice and provided for the present organization and incorporation.

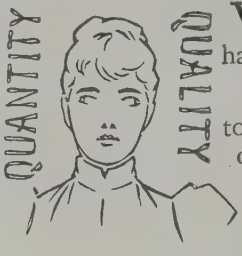
A spot could hardly be found more healthful, attractive and inspiring, embowered in sweet-scented orange groves, yet looking off on the rugged Sierras; more central and convenient of access, yet apart from the temptations incident to large cities, especially in a new country. No feature, however, could be more ideal than its constituency, with a single exception. From the first the united demand was for the New England type of college, the highest standards and the Christian spirit dominant in all and every part. Such a college they would sustain to the utmost of their ability. Beginning with this ideal eight years ago, the third class is just completing the curriculum. Of the twenty-four graduates eleven expect next year to be doing graduate work in the universities, four of which have already accepted Pomona's diploma.

The exception to this constituency is in the fact that very generally at present they have no incomes. They own their plants. But, though thrifty, vigorous, resourceful, they are put to their wits' end to buy everything, implements, fertilizers, feed for stock, family supplies, pay taxes, build and sustain all sorts of public institutions, without dividends and without a dollar for their labor. Reduced wages, shortened time, the year's crops cut off is bad, but no one could anticipate this drain, without one rill of supply, kept up two, three, four, five, even six years.

Out of such homes come the students, of New England stock, self-respecting young men and women, willing to work and suffer for an education. Many of them, in whole or in part, support themselves. The professors are committed body and soul to the work. College graduates, and most of them having degrees from New England institutions, they are in demand. Nearly every one has turned away from a larger salary promptly paid.

A few years hence this constituency can take care of its own college thus trained to habits of frugality. The emergency that now claims general interest is the pressing demands and golden opportunities, which must be provided for at once, or else the work accomplished, the prestige gained, the benevolence appropriated, must all be lost forever to those who so much need and appreciate them and to the general cause of Christian education. "Hold on a little longer," say these generously disposed friends, "it is our college, we can help soon." But simply to "hold on" means embarrassing debt. Northern California, as remote as Buffalo from Boston, not to mention intervening mountains and deserts and difference of origin, history and customs, has few wealthy men in any of its churches.

This proposition of the Field estate comes as the voice of God pointing out a way of deliverance—the only way apparent to assured permanency and unfettered success to one of the most hopeful colleges in the whole brilliant galaxy that so richly adorns this favored land. One grand response has come. Mr. C. H. Baldwin, father of the president, has pledged to this fund $25,000, one-fourth, it is understood, of his entire property. Every one of the seventy-five churches, although more than forty of them are home-missionary churches, is open to the appeal of the college, and not a few out of them are making heroic sacrifices for it. But the supreme efforts of a constituency situated as this is at present must be supplemented by other friends if the college is to avail itself of this timely aid.



Which have you an eye to, quantity or quality, when you buy something to make washing easy? If it's quality, you want Pearline (use without soap). In effectiveness, in economy, and above all in its absolute harmlessness, no matter how or where you use it there's nothing to compare with this, the first and only washing-compound. What difference does the quantity make, after all?

If you spend five cents or ten cents or a dollar for an aid to washing, don't you want the thing that will give you the most work, the best work, and the most certain safety for that amount of money? That thing is Pearline (use no soap). 483

EDUCATION.

—— Benjamin Ide Wheeler, now at the head of the Greek department of Cornell, has been elected president of Rochester University, New York.

—— Rev. J. H. Twichell of Hartford delivered the address at the dedication of the Woolsey statue at Yale last week. This is the statue over the location of which there has been so much controversy. The faculty finally yielded to the wishes of the students and it was placed in front of the library, facing the new Phelps Memorial Arch.

—— Phillips Academy, Andover, graduated last week 140 young men, the largest class in its history. Those going direct to college together with certain members of the middle class make, it is stated, the largest number that ever entered college in a single year from any preparatory school in the country. The last piece at the exhibition elicited great applause, being a "Character sketch of Abdul Hamid II.," delivered by a son of Dr. Christie of Tarsus in Asia Minor. The exhibition was held for the first time in the Seminary Chapel, the Academy Hall being given up to an alumni dinner, presided over by ex-Congressman Stevens and addressed by Rev. Dr. L. T. Chamberlain, Prof. D. C. Wells of Dartmouth and other alumni. Professor Churchill had preached the baccalaureate sermon on the preceding Sunday.

—— The fourteenth Commencement of Yankton College occurred June 14-17. The baccalaureate sermon was preached on Sunday by Pres. H. K. Warren and an address was given before the Christian Associations of the college by Rev. E. M. Williams, D. D., upon The Certainty of the Ultimate Triumph of the Redeemer's Kingdom. Monday and Tuesday were occupied with college examinations. Monday evening came the Commencement of the Conservatory of Music and the Commencement of the academy occurred Tuesday evening, with seven graduates. The college Commencement followed on Wednesday afternoon, with three graduates. Rev. J. F. Loba, D. D., of Evanston, Ill., gave the Commencement address upon The Service of Idealism to Present Life. Wednesday evening the members of the corporation, the trustees, faculty, alumni and a few invited guests gathered for a dinner and reunion. An otherwise trying financial year has been cheered by a gift of $5,000, available for current expenses, from the late Dr. E. K. Alden and a gift of $1,000 from a Boston woman for the equipment of the department of biology.

—— Drury College Commencement was one of unusual interest, June 11. The long, hard struggle to secure Dr. Pearsons's generous gifts had resulted in complete success, and the promises he had made were promptly and cheerfully fulfilled, as always. The usual heavy deficit had been cut down to small proportions and will not occur next year. The only cloud on the occasion was the fact that President Fuller, who has labored incessantly in this matter, was taken quite ill on the evening of the annual reception. His friends are hopeful that rest and freedom from care will restore him to health again. The Graduating Class numbered seven and the exercises were of a high order. There has been good work in every department and it was felt that Drury offers excellent advantages in scholarship. One of the helpful features of the year has been the use of Fairbanks Hall for the boys of the academy, under the immediate supervision of Principal Howland and his wife, who live in the building and make it a real home for the boys. The rooms are being fitted up, as the finances permit, and made attractive, and the best of order prevails. President Fuller has been at work upon the course of study and valuable improvements will be made. It is hoped that he may be able now to devote his time exclusively to the regular work of the college.

An Opinion.

LANGDON KAINE, writing in The Commercial Advertiser, says: "These sermons are not only quite as original as, and not less absorbing and beautiful than, the same author's stories and sketches. They are much more than that—they are a revelation to those who are not in close touch with Christian thought, perhaps a revelation to many devout Christians, and a delight to all honest souls. One does not get an understanding of the strong intellect and great heart of the author of "The Bonnie Brier Bush" until he reads the last word of his published sermons. No reader can be quite prepared for the abundant originality and evidences of wide culture which he displays in this series of sermons. There is hardly a line in the fifteen sermons that is redundant, hardly a sentence that has been put there to cover space—but all have a part in revealing the faith of the preacher. The style is lucid, graceful and charming, but the style is lost to the thought in the interest awakened by the exposition. No history of Jesus, no series of sermons on the nature of religion and the destiny of the human race, ever gave to the world a more consistent revelation of the simplicity of the laws of God, of the sweetness of the character of Christ, or ever offered so alluring a path for men to follow. It is calculated to establish an epoch in the history of Christianity by removing from its forms the hideous masks and repulsive coverings that theories have made to conceal it."
